The Ballad of Horatio Sanz

By Nick Nelson ~ Daily Bull

Horatio Sanz is undisputedly the best terrible comedian in the history of existence. Let us, together, explore the history and the destiny of this paradoxical being.

Horatio Sanz is an alien android spy sent to Earth by aliens from the planet Suppositron. He was conceived in 1734 by a platypus impregnated by a Suppositron probe. His original mission was to infiltrate minority activist movements and spice them up with bad Hispanic humor before assassinating their leaders, but, over time, he developed consciousness and learned to love humans.

The Black Hole: Part 1

By John Pastore ~ Daily Bull

Day 1: RESEARCH PROJECT CREATES SINGULARITY: ENERGY CRISIS OVER!!

A student working on a nano-technological field-based assembler along with the MTU physics department successfully created a semi-stable singularity, or black hole. Says the professor, "As the mass is just so tiny, Hawking Radiation dissipates it right away. Still, that's an awful lot of energy, and if you toss matter directly into it, you get GPE out!"

The student interjects: "That's gravitational potential energy. I mean, you're dropping mass from a height into an infinitely deep hole – it's gonna accelerate, and not cleanly either. It'll vibrate so fast, you'll get radio and UV and X-Rays out." Plans are underway to replace the new bio-diesel generators with singularity generators, which will receive a slow trickle of matter in turn for boiling massive quantities of water. "It's just really efficient, and safe. That's all. Way more efficient than burning corn, or coal, or oil, or fission, or even fusion, and nothing to worry about at all. We're more efficient than the sun, right here. No danger at all."

When pressed about the danger, the student squirmed; the professor took his cue. "There's absolutely no danger, none at all. Not only is the singularity contained within a very powerful electrostatic trap, but it's mass is so tiny that even if we were to drop it, it'd dissipate before reaching Earth's dense, rich, nougaty core."

"Course', we'd be pwned if it did reach the core. Don't quote me on that, I don't have my slide rule. Chortle."

Plans are underway to construct an even larger singularity; electrical and chemical engineers are being drafted to design a containment vessel to the physicists' specifications. "It has to be good, and not shitty at all.", says one physicist.

There are some concerned students on campus, but when presented with information that there are currently no government regulations preventing the generation and storage of material, which violates only most physical laws as we enjoy them, they all became unusually passive and unconcerned. Says one grungy young adult, "Our government's executive branch isn't reality based, so I guess this is just another part of getting used to it. We've been living in a Kafka-esqe world for all our lives anyways. This isn't going to change jack. I'm gonna go play WoW or something..." Some militant students persisted, but gave up when told a singularity may be covered by the second amendment. Says one, "Damn, now I've just gotta get me a singularity gun..."

"Some would say we should only test these things in the deep of space, slowly and carefully, before building exploitative technologies around it. Seeing as 'deep space' is 11,500 meters per second away from our little gravity well, and that in turn is at least a half decade of gravity-sliding shottng a satellite with all of this equipment, I've just gotta say, screw that! I'm going for a OPEC!" ☹

... Horatio Sanz from front

By 1912, Horatio Sanz was performing stand-up comedy at small-town clubs and bars, earning an average of 12 cents per night. Over the course of fifty-eight years, he had earned enough to move on to New York City. The popular television program Saturday Night Live (SNL) noticed his humor and lack thereof and promptly took him under its wing. Only briefly into his tenure at SNL, Sanz performed a horrific experimental medical operation on himself – a procedure involving a one-hundred-pound fat tissue graft and at least seventeen arm grafts, according to popular Sanz lore. In the most selfless act in his life, he willingly had sexual intercourse with Anna Nicole Smith, and from their hideous coupling spawned the hybrid Chris Kattan – half dumbass, half retard, and one-hundred percent not funny.

In 2008, Horatio Sanz was exiled from SNL when he tackled Hilary Duff and the Olsen Twins with six arms. With the majority of employers on Earth not accepting of nineteen-armed space androids, Sanz withdrew to hermitry. All but a few forgot about him, and with those that remembered, Sanz developed empathic and telepathic links. Through these means, he began to control these few devoted humans. He sent them through-out the countryside to convert more feeble-minded followers. All did his bidding loyally.

Several decades later, Sanz became the first being ever to be recognized as a god when he initiated the second Holocaust, this one targeting the annoying nuisances of the world like my roommate's ex-girlfriend's sister. Survivors were sent care packages consisting mostly of Johnson & Johnson™ Baby Shampoo. Then they were gently reminded that no one cares about them and that they should probably be like Horatio Sanz and disap-
