Bull-Forced Movie Suggestions: No Country for Old Men

By Simon Mused ~ Daily Bull

Despite its somewhat confusing title, the movie was actually pretty good. Based on the novel by the same name (because quality original movie plot ideas just don't exist anymore), the story revolves around Llewelyn Moss (Josh Brolin). He's just some redneck hunter dude that found some dead Mexicans, trucks full of heroin, and another dead body with a sack of $2 million. Obviously he gets dragged into a serious drug ring. Then a couple killers try to get him, and some sheriff with some past qualms about stuff tries to save Moss and his wife. That's basically the plot in a nutshell.

I actually have to say that

Millions Starve to Solve World Hunger

By Nathan "Invincible" Miller ~ Daily Bull

Over 800 million people starved to death in January in an attempt to solve world hunger, according to the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) of the United Nations. With substantially less people to feed on the planet, it is hoped that those who were lucky enough to survive will now have plenty to eat.

"These people will not have died in vain!" cheers Ban Ki-moon, Secretary-General of the UN, whose groundbreaking policy of forced starvation is expected to save the planet. "All of us who are still alive can look back and think, I'm glad thousands of other people died so I could have a full meal."

Contrary to previous plans that would simply try and feed everyone their fair share, newly discovered methods of persuasion have made it possible to convince people to sacrifice themselves 'for the good of the colony.' As a result, hundreds of millions of people who were previously taking up space simply walked out of society, never to be seen again.

"We are very pleased with the results," says Hunger Expert Jamie Davis. "With hundreds of millions of less mouths to feed, starvation will be a thing of the past. It's time the human race started on a new path, one towards total obesity and never feeling hungry again!"

While many believed it was impossible to convince so many people to starve so others could enjoy a juicy steak with every meal, the transition happened quite effortlessly, with very little uprising or controversy.

"I guess they all kind of knew in the back of their mind that they were holding the human race back, and it'd be better for all of us if they got up and died so we wouldn't have to deal with them," explains Davis while snacking on delicious imported Chinese candies that could have fed 18 small children. "We offered to send them to Mars to found a new colony, but our technology hasn't advanced that far. Pity to seem them go to waste like that."

Some were not keen on dying so easily. Often entire populations destined for the grave fought for their right to stay alive, but in the end even they submitted.

"The nerve! They say we don't need anybody living in the desert eating sand, and that we should all shrivel up and let everyone else eat well. I couldn't believe it!" argues Moroccan King Mohammed VI, an anti-starving survivor (ASS). "We may be ASSes, but they aren't going to tear us from our ancestral homelands and make us eat food somewhere else! Never!"

Hunger Experts like Dr. Davis are quick to argue against such ancestral homelands, stating that if their ancestors still lived in a desert with no food, they'd rather move somewhere else or lay down and wait for the sand to cover them up. The same logic also applies to the Siberians, people living on small Pacific Islands, those on volcanoes, and Hippies eating nothing but tofu.

This is not the first time the human race has tried to put a limit on the number of souls able to be spawned. A rogue wizard bent on world domination caused the Black Death during the 1300s, and WWII actually was a massive cover-up between the primary fighting nations to kill off enough soldiers to stabilize dinnertime meal shrinkage. ☹

...Movie from front

Moss was a little annoying in the film. He didn't have that many awesomely badass moments in the film. The closest I could think of was running from a pit bull then shooting it in the face when it was going to pounce on him. All of his problems were self-inflicted, so there was no point in feeling sorry for the guy. If you ask me, I would never steal money from a dead drug trafficker. The guy was just plain stupid and deserved most of what came his way.

Anton Chigurh (Javier Bardem), on the other hand, is a total badass throughout the movie. Carrying around a compressed air-powered bolt hammer and sporting a haircut that makes him look like he is ready to dance for berries and crème Starburst, he threatens to kill anything that moves. The first thing he does in the movie straight off the bat is kill a cop, pull a guy over with the cop car, kill that guy, then drive off with his car. He even kills the people that hired him so that he could get 100% of the money found. Damn this guy was a dick.

What made him even more awesome was his dialog with others. He creeped out everyone who asked him a question and created hilariously awkward situations for those who had to talk to him. He would enjoy answering questions with questions and doesn't mind behaving very offended to simple questions just to make people regret initiating small talk. Hilariously evil villains like him haven't been created since Hannibal Lecter.

The Internet Movie Database points out over thirty anachronisms in the movie, as modern designs, car models, and franchises are seen throughout the 1980 timeframe of the movie. They also claim that it would be impossible to fit $2 million in a satchel of the size used in the movie using "logic" and considering "volume". They also point out that using Chigurh's hardcore air-pressure hammer to bust open doors would not be physically possible. Balderdash!

On a side note, Josh Bowlin will be starring in an upcoming documentary on the life and career of President George W Bush. The film is stated to be released either on Election Day or inauguration day, and is classified as a biographical documentary along with being a political drama. Hmmm....

This is actually one of those rare movies that I will not give some obnoxious score to, as it deserves its ∞/∞ rating. That's right, infinite recommendation! ☹
