Extension Discrimination

By Liz Fujita ~ Daily Bull

Despite being short, female, half-Asian, and a couple of other discrimination-ready things, I've never really felt like people are excluding me because of them. And thank goodness – I've never wanted to deal with anti-Michigander sentiment or extremist groups who want to kill everyone with feet smaller than size 7. But I have noticed some moderate discrimination against my computer allegiance.

As a Mac living in a predominantly PC era, I've had to face a lot of oppression. We're not allowed to play the games that the little PC kids are. If we want to, we have to go ask the government (aka computer store) for special permissions (known as "dual boots"). Sniffle, sniffle. We aren't allowed to use all the shiny scientific toys that PCs and Linux Boxes use all the time.

Ethicists Torn Over Renewable Puppy Power

By Nathan 'Invincible' Miller ~ Daily Bull

Mankind's greatest moral thinkers have come to a head on whether research should continue on a groundbreaking new method of generating electricity: Puppy power. The potentially limitless energy source was found to cheap, reliable, and easy to set up in homes around the world.

Dr. Ben Bradley, head researcher of the revolutionary project, realized their energy potential after playing fetch with his golden retriever puppy for nearly five hours before giving up when it got dark.

"Ghettoblaster never quit, no matter how far I'd throw his ball," said Ben of his exuberant puppy. "He just kept going and going, pausing every now and then to chomp on some food. That's when it hit me: I'd stick the little guy in one of those hamster wheels and power my house. That little whelp just about does it too!"

Seemingly limitless amounts of power?

With a max output of nearly 400 watts, Ghettoblaster successfully ran for over 18 hours straight before collapsing into a cute little heap of floppy ears and fluffy fur. After sleeping restlessly for a few hours while dreaming of rabbits and elusive grasshoppers, he was up and at it again, conveniently charging Dr. Bradley's electric car before he left for the lab.

Ethicists are up in arms over the treatment of the bumbling young dogs, who, despite having bountiful supplies of energy to spare, "should not be treated like a barrel of oil or ton of coal."

"These puppies are being abused in ways unimaginable only a few short years ago," claims Greenpeace activist Lexi Reid. "How would you like it if you were forced to run in a little wheel all day, chasing after a bone as your tongue lapped at a water hose dripping into your mouth? They don't even get the bone at the end of the day! It just sits there behind their cage, drawing them on forever. Cruelty to animals, that's what this is."

Utility companies are investing heavily into the nascent industry, sending breeders to shelters nationwide to adopt the rambunctious little monsters. Only the wildest, hard to control puppies will be admitted into the program, as any lazy pooch would dampen the astronomical efficiencies garnered thus far. Dr. Bradley explains.

"Somehow these puppies are creating energy out of thin air. Give 'em a handful of kibble, and they'll run for almost 2 hours. Nothing like this has ever been seen before. For every watt of energy we put in, we get 10 out. Simply amazing."

PETA, renowned for freeing 73 earthworms from a government-run biomass plant in 1997, has not commented on the current developments in puppy power. Many fear their silence may indicate impending trouble on the horizon, with researchers keeping a watchful eye on their subjects.

Many analysts are debating the effectiveness of the puppies in helping alleviate America from its addiction to oil. Millions of puppies would be required, and would soon outgrow their maximum generating capacity.

Says Bradley, "After 6 months of running the little guy ragged, Ghet-toblaster kinda mellowed out and chewed his rawhide all day. He's pretty much given up on helping me reduce my dependence on foreign oil and dirty coal, so I might have to put my son to work manning the wheel until I can wrangle down some more pups."

"I wonder if the SPCA accepts bulk orders..." he added, scrawling electricity to kibble rates in a notepad. "I could well be on my way to powering the whole block."

Russia has reportedly experimented with animal power generation for decades, finally giving up when elephants were found to expel their methane payload too infrequently to be commercially viable.

...Windows Sucks from front

But the thing that annoyed me most just happened a few months ago. See, I tried to be a good, subservient oppressed minority. I tried to help Windows! Yes! You heard it! I saw online that the Beta of Office 2010 has been released, and I was excited to give it a whirl to see if it was as shiny as they promise - maybe make some suggestions if I saw any. I even created a Windows ID so that I could access the download page. I clicked! And then - a .exe file?! RAAAAAAGEEEEE!!!

What a waste! I can't even run a .exe, Bill Gates. Now I'll have to wait ages to use Office '10, all because my people use .dmg instead and Windows takes a long time to have that open door policy with our rebellious faction.

I mean, come on. We let them use iTunes without whining. =(
