Spring Break!

By Frank McGuire ~ Daily Bull

Spring break is that great time when you can leave school behind for a week and have some fun. While enjoying myself in the Twin Cities, I discovered True Love: Pizza with feta cheese, ham, French fries, and broccoli! The fine establishment that we were at specializes in pizza combinations. They have pretty much everything that you could ever want, as well as some combinations that should never be combined (like fried eggplant, BBQ sauces, and ham, even I could not take that one).

Some of my favorites included Mac and Cheese Ham-

Tug Me Into That Fiery Inferno

By Stephen Whittaker ~ Daily Bull

Among the many things I did over spring break, I was able to watch "Drag Me to Hell". It was one of those movies where the director got about half way through the movie and said F*&! it, turning the whole movie into a shitshow. I'm usually all for the B-movie crappieness as long as it doesn't take itself too seriously. With a director like Sam Raimi, I really am not too surprised that it did turn into shitshow. From his track record of movies like Evil Dead and Army of Darkness, I wouldn't expect anything less.

The movie actually casted a few good actors, notably Justin Ling and Alison Lohman, and they played there parts well, but somehow the movie ends up missing the crappy actors playing lead rolls appeal that many B-movies posses. I can't even really say this is a B-movie, but the scenes are shot in that fashion almost like someone ran around with a video camera to shoot it.

Here is the gist of it: a young woman, loan officer Christine Brown, is approached by an old gypsy woman who needs an extension on her mortgage. After refusing the old woman's plea for an extension to land promotion, the old lady goes ape shit and attacks her. Later the old lady hides in the Christine's car to attack her again when she gets off work. They struggle and the old woman places a curse on Christine.

Seemingly innocent? Or villainous mortgage-defecter?

Afterwards she sees a medium who claims that she has been cursed and will experience three days of tormenting from a demon who will eventually collect her soul on the fourth day. So then she tries to appease the demon and have it not take her soul by sacrificing her kitten to the demon. Shortly there after, what appears to be the old woman starts chasing her. She goes in a tool shed where the old woman grabs her around the neck and begins to strangle her. Luckily, there happened to be an ice skate nearby and an anvil precariously being suspended overhead, held up by a rope confidently tied to beam next to her. Think Wile E Coyote. I think you can take it from here- cut the rope, making the anvil fall on the old lady

Nathan Wonders: Election Night Special

Brought to you by Nathan 'Invincible' Miller

On Wednesday we had our annual 'hands up for who you want' elections for the Bull. Amazingly, it was a freakishly serious night, something that doesn't happen very often at our meetings. Even more amazing was people's willingness to actually fill our officer positions, yet another sign that we're finally on the recovery. So without further ado, here are our 2010 winners!

After a lengthy debate, Liz Fujita will be taking over as Editor-in-Chief and Chalk Thrower. Jon "Big-O" Mahan was voted to be Composition Editor, and was nearly defeated for the Webmaster position by Bryne's left foot. Voters were so confident that Simon Mused was the best candidate for Business Manager that nobody else was nominated. Alec Hamer gave an uplifting speech for the Treasurer position, only to be beaten by the speech itself. Finally, Stephen Whittaker beat out half the staff for the coveted Secretary position.

Just be glad Frodo's feet didn't run against Bryne's feet - and that Alec's speech was more eloquent than Sarah Palin's!

As for me, it looks like after I train up our new officers I'll be retiring. It'll be quite the transition, especially considering all the schools I'm considering for grad school don't have anything like the Bull. Hmm... I smell a franchise possibility. If I can turn MTU's Daily Bull around, how hard could it be to start another from scratch? ☺

When finding out that the sacrifice had not appeased the demon, she goes to see the medium again who advises her to see another woman who had dealt with the demon before. Upon meeting the lady, she is told to sit with the lady, the medium, the lady's house servant, and a goat. The original plan was to have the demon possess her and then push the demon into a goat then kill the goat. The demon possesses the old woman and then is forced into the goat, where it chants in a demonic goat voice shouting curses and threats. They fail to kill the goat and the demon manages to possess the house servant who then begins to dance on the table in string-puppet-like manner while regurgitating the cat, shouting how it doesn't want a cat and it's going to take her soul. The woman manages to banish the demon but was not able to lift the curse.

The medium then tells her that the only way to rid the curse is to give the button that was cursed by the old lady to another person damning them to her fate. In a craze she resolves to take the button and give it to the old lady and digs up her grave and shoves the button down her throat.

From here I won't ruin the ending; you'll have to watch it for yourself. It was a definitely a trip and better than a lot of movies I have watched. It is also very Sam Raimi as far as the gore is concerned, and there is gore to go around. I'm going to give it a four Anviled old ladies out of Five. 🐾

burger helper on a bed of spinach, spicy chicken, mushrooms, peppers, and onions all on a spicy ranch sauce, to the more traditional like ham and steak on pizza sauce. The best part of the place was the crust. The crust was perfectly cooked so that the edges were very crispy while the center was like freshly cooked bread. It was scrumptious! To top it all off, a nice 8-month-old beer that was fermented in Jack Daniels barrels to obtain some of the flavor with a nice malty coffee finish made the night one to remember! 🐾

Welcome to America - Yes, America. By Nathan 'Invincible' Miller ~ Daily Bull

Hey, I've got a question for you: What are you? What's your nationality, what makes you up? Half Polish and the rest Dutch or German? 1/4 Chinese? 77% Russian with a smattering of Tabasco sauce? We're all something. BUT YOU KNOW WHAT I AM?

I'm 100% full-blooded American. I'm not from Poland, Prussia, Lichtenstein, or even Mexico. I'm from Pennsylvania – a state in America. Weird, huh? I'm not even 2% of anything, even milk. I drink 1% milk, and thankfully, I'm not what I eat. Otherwise I'd be 60% circus peanut, 20% cow, and 20% of other nationalities that I didn't bother to ask about before I cooked them up and ate them.

"But Nathan, you have to be something! My grandpa was the son of an Scottish fisherman twice removed and my mom has descendents tracing all the way back to the Crusaders from Turkey, which makes me practically in line with the Queen!" Oh please. Keeping track of your family tree is soooo 20th century. I bet if I looked at mine, I have relatives from every single country in Europe. I guess you could say I'm European Union.

Nah, I'd rather be American any day. You know, the red-white-and-blue kind. Go US! Like our founding fathers, I've got a big ego, a trait that has transcended generations of Americans. I can beat anything, even British Empires. South trying to secede and steal our land? CRUSH EM! Germany taking over a totally different continent? ANNIHILATION TIME! Big exam coming up? BRING OUT THE BIG GUNS! Overkill is a natural American tendency.

Sure, other countries have their pluses. Germans make neat things, Jamaicans can run really fast, and Australians are better at wrestling deadly animals. But plenty of other countries aren't so hot, so who'd want to hold onto bad connotations or historical fallacies? Last time I checked, bragging about having Soviet blood when one's family came to America before the Soviets came to power doesn't make any sense.

Which brings me to seemingly everyone's favorite holiday: St. Patrick's Day. Is everyone Irish these days? According to Wikipedia, 50 million people claimed to have Irish ancestry to some degree. I ate a potato once, does that make me Irish? The Great Famine happened there in the 1840s - 170 years ago, which is when the majority of the Irish came here. Are those people directly influencing us anymore? Aside from four leaf clovers and Lucky Charms cereal, I think not.

America may have been built upon immigration, but that was a long time ago. I think it's about time we concentrated on building our own national identity, instead of claiming to be someone else. This is America, and unless your extended family isn't from the country, there isn't any point in keeping track. You're American now, especially if your family has been living here for almost forever. Let go of whatever country they originally came from. They probably don't want you back anyway. 🐾
