Jumping Car?!

By Liz Fujita ~ Daily Bull

The world has been dreaming of flying cars since the dawn of futuristic films. So far, it hasn't been practical to assume that cars will be cruising in special lanes above the rest of us, but the world may yet see real-life leapfrog on the freeway.

Popular car manufacturer Subaru announced recently that it's going to rally for Leap Zones – similar to passing lanes, these would be stretches of road where drivers could physically jump over slower traffic. What's the catch? You would have to be an owner of their soon-to-be-released vehicles, the Kangaru.

Basically, the Kangaru propels the driver through the air at the touch of a button. Provided said driver is moving fast enough, the leap should be feasible. "Kinematics says this could be possible," confirmed several Michigan Tech physics majors. Unfortunately, the auto industry is working to give Subaru a sharp reality check.

For instance: what if you go to jump-pass and the car below you speeds up?

Freddy vs. Jason vs. Rambo Takes Top Spot at Box Office

By Nathan 'Invincible' Miller ~ Daily Bull

The horror-action-slasher thriller Freddy vs. Jason vs. Rambo rocketed to the top of the box office charts this past weekend, blowing past Alice in Wonderland with a weekend gross of $77 million.

"It's a great honor to have worked with such a talented and botched up group of writers and developers," cheers Sylvester Stallone, who co-directed the bloodbath along with Ronny Yu. "A chance to bring to life a beast like this only comes along once in a lifetime."

Stallone also plays the part of John Rambo, a Vietnam War veteran who becomes sucked into the nightmarish drama of the Crystal Lake/Springwood area. While stopping at a small diner, the hardened soldier witnesses the grisly slaying of a convertible full of teenagers by Jason Voorhees, setting off a string of events that leads to the reawakening of Freddy Krueger. The undead dream killer proceeds to slaughter an untold number of Springwood residents, much to the chagrin of Rambo.

"This guy's seen a lot in his day, but this takes the cake," Stallone explains at a Hollywood press conference. "All he knows is that he's gotta get those civilians outta there or they're toast. It's do or die time, and no hockey mask wearing freak is gonna show up John Rambo's machete wielding skills."

The climactic battle between the three experienced killers takes place in an abandoned warehouse near Crystal Lake, where Rambo ambushed Voorhees in a pit-fall type trap. Sensing an opportunity to put them both in an early grave, Freddy swoops in to slash their throats. Unfortunately for him, Rambo pulls around his M60 machine gun in the nick of time and gives the otherworldly demon a taste of cold, American lead. The critics rave.

...Showdown from front

"Arguably the most chaotic and action packed thriller since Band of Slaughterers." ~ The New York Times

"An outstanding piece of American cinema; 5 stars!" ~ Entertainment Weekly

"With a body count of 863, how can you go wrong?" ~ Rotten Tomatoes

"Blood bath? More like blood tidal wave!" ~ Playboy Magazine

After its stunning opening weekend, Freddy vs. Jason vs. Rambo promises to hold the top spot for weeks to come, as both word of mouth and a lack of worthy competitors pave the way for continued success. With a budget of nearly $110 million likely to be recouped by the end of its first week, movie distributor Lionsgate should see healthy profits of its latest Rambo installment.

"I was so excited to see Rambo annihilate Jason with that dynamite truck that I went and saw it in 3-D at an IMAX theater!" exclaims Ruben Garcia, a rabid fanboy of the Rambo series. "Even at $15 a ticket, it was sooo worth it."

Early industry reports indicate that the limited edition Blu-Ray Death Pack Bundle will include 100 rounds of .50-caliber ammunition, a pocket machete stained with real blood, and a sweater knitting instruction guide. ☹

...BOING BOING from front

Well, Generic Man, if that were the case, a jumping Subaru Kangaru would almost certainly land squarely on top of the car it tried to pass, squishing both vehicles and their drivers into metallic flap jacks. Since the car only promises hops, there will be no jet boosters to ensure a safe landing. Experts do say, however, that finger-crossing has been relatively effective in preventing "belly flops." Prayer is still being investigative, since results are shotty.

Another problem with the idea of a Kangaru is its potential for abuse by NASCAR drivers. Subaru does manufacture racing cars, but representatives insist that jumping would be far too dangerous at those velocities. In addition, having a car with a bit of bounce could lead to unfair race results.

"We saw in a couple of test runs that drivers would jump and land their car on top of another intentionally," explained Subaru affiliate Philip Nash. "Then, when the two cross the finish line, there's no way of knowing who won!" Both drivers in the test run are in intensive care; doctors are working hard to flatten them out from their Loo-ney Tunes accordion-style injuries.

Somehow overlooked is the idea of tangential motion, which would lead to real-life Final Destination scenes if drivers passed during a turn.

The last problem Subaru test drivers discovered was that Leap Zones would have to be placed on very long stretches of straight road. After bypassing a slowpoke, the last thing anyone would want to see beneath them would be the road curving away to the left – landing in a bog may be less painful, but it hampers one's ability to reach a destination. A group of four damp test-pilots chimed, "Unless they're giving the Kangaru functional legs or a prehensile tail, landing in a ditch, swamp, woods, or lava pit is going to be a huge hazard."

Subaru has reluctantly agreed to postpone the release of the Kangaru until further tests are done to improve its usability. In the meantime, competitor Suzuki plans to unveil a smart car that can slither beneath semi-trucks when passing lanes aren't available, and Toyota wants to improve its design for a motorcycle unicycle. Regardless of which (if any) are released, travelers nationwide should be advised to use other means of transit, and remember that sometimes, futuristic innovation is just plain stupid. ☹
