A DAY IN THE LIFE OF A DEATH EATER

By Sandra "M̄NERVA" Custer

The following is a tale from a Death Eater during our last meeting where we asked each member to tell us about their day:

I woke up early this morning, for I had a long list of things to complete before I crawled back into my twin-size bed. After getting dressed and washing the grime out of my hair, I prayed to the Dark Lord then promptly made a breakfast of eggs, ham and rye toast. My mother called on the tele. My it was nice to talk to her! She was doing fine after father "mysteriously" wound up dead two months ago. I promised to be home for our family Yule get-together; luckily my brother won't be home since he still can't remember where mother lives ...see mmm... soul food on back

HARRY POTTER FANS: THE MORE YOU KNOW

By Mary "HEDWIG" Kennedy ~ Daily Bull

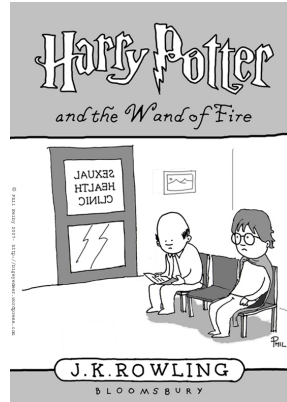

This is a public service announcement: With the new Harry Potter movie coming out within the next few days, it is important to protect yourself against the various fans you may encounter. The following is a guide to allow you to judge just how much danger you might be in:

There are two classes of fans: the causal and the obsessive. Within each class are several subclasses that you must be aware of in order to identify to proceed when smooched in the long midnight-showing line.

Casual: There are two "casual" subclasses, and neither is particularly dangerous.

The Casual Reader: Casual readers are not necessarily fans of the genre, but have been caught up in the adventure that is "Harry Potter". All their friends were reading the stories, so they decided to pick up the books as well. Typically, these creatures are dragged to the premiere of the newest "Harry Potter" movie, but are most likely to be the gopher of the group: they will take any chance they can get to do something other than wait in line for ten hours, even if that means taking food orders and finding large sticks to fend off the more dangerous fans.

The Casual Fan: Casual fans have usually been indoctrinated into "Harry Potter" at an early age and as such have worked their way into the fandom. Casual fans can sometimes be difficult to distinguish from the obsessive groups, but closer inspection is all that is necessary. A casual fan may wait in line for hours for the next movie or book, but is very unlikely to be dressed in full costume or talk incessantly about minute details for any extended period of time. These are the fans that shake their heads at the obsessive fans and wonder how anyone can be that crazy.

Obsessive: There are three "obsessive" subclasses, and these can range from annoying to extremely dangerous.

The Obsessive Reader: You all know who these are. While they may have combinations of classes, obsessive readers are those who particular obsess over every minor detail in the "Harry Potter" universe [editor's note: which we like to call the Potterverse!], to the point where the movies absolutely infuriate them. These beings annoy absolutely everyone, with the exception of some obsessive fans who have the horrible hybridization of reader/fan. In order to avoid, do not mention "Harry Potter" or you will find yourself wanting to grab something very large and beat them over the head.

The Obsessive Fan: Pretty self explanatory, these are the fans who have a grand multitude of "Harry Potter" paraphernalia and have laid claim to knowing the most about the series above anyone else. They can frequently be found camping out days in advance for midnight showings, garbed in full costume. One annoying quirk: if you come across an obsessive reader/fan hybrid, and you yourself are an obsessive fan, your attire must be perfect or even you may reconsider your stance in the "Harry Potter" fandom.

The Obsessive Fangirl: These fans act like obsessive fans, but actually know very little about the universe itself. They lay claim to any numerous characters in the books (OMG, Draco plz to haz my babez, kthxbai!- Tara Gilesbie) and will more often than not write horrible fanfiction about their encounters. They must be shot on site.

As a conclusion to this Public Service Announcement, if you qualify as "casual", take the necessary steps to avoid contact with obsessives if at all possible. If you qualify as "obsessive", stop pissing off everyone and get a life. Obsessive fans can take heart as they can never be as bad as "Twilight" fans.☺

... mmm... soul food from front after his time at Hogwarts. I can't stand any of those books he wrote. I also assured mother that I wasn't killing anyone recently, and that I was trying to turn over a new leaf. I don't like causing her to worry about me; I know it would kill her if I went to Azkaban.

After mother hung up, I set about the spells to clean my kitchen and the rest of my small one bedroom home. Spent half an hour daydreaming of Bellatrix, wondering why every woman I meet that is sexy and good-looking has to be as crazy as a bat; my mother would not approve. I decided to go see a friend at Azkaban like I do every week. I think the conditions are starting to get to him, he is starting to speak of imaginary things, like how the Dark Lord shall fail and how it is time to return to the side of good, like dear Snape.

After the visit I ran errands, first to Knockturn Alley to get a few odds and ends before going to the Muggle world and buying groceries. Cursed a child there... he wouldn't stop his scream about wanting candy and ice cream. All his parents did was act like the child was doing nothing wrong; there shall be fewer sweets in the future for the kid after this visit. After that lovely shopping experience I went to the cleaners and picked up my robes.

Dropping things off at my house, I considered my friend's words about turning over a new leaf. Though quickly I dismissed that for during my time at Hogwarts not once did they have good cookies. It was always Riddle that brought the good little treats for our house to eat and drink. To go on the side of Harry Potter would take away the joy of delicious cookies that we share every week at our DEA (Death Eaters Anonymous) meetings.

And so now I am sitting here in out meeting with my newly polished mask and freshly cleaned robes.

The meeting ended with a serving of fresh cookies made by one of our younger members and the group laughed at how we are anonymous to even those outside of the meeting. We agreed the meeting of DEA would still continue and that next week we shall be watching a movie, sharing our favorite curses, and bringing in our familiars.☺
