Top scientists at MIT purportedly a new, smaller-than-ever nano-particle this week, affectionately dubbing the tiny atomic component "pixel". According to the most reliable of hearsay, the shocking discovery was made when two scientists working one late night identified fine lines between the spaces seeming occupied by quarks (the previously smallest accepted particle) on a zoomed up picture. Astounded by their findings, they quickly took several more pictures only to find the phenomenon repeated on each one.

Recent claims have been made that sporting a beard, ponytail, and skirt make you look badass. I would like to see how much of a BAMF such a person (Olivia) would look like whilst their head is being crushed between someone's thighs, and trust me you don't want to know where said person's face is during all of this. Here are some reasons why Jiu Jitsu makes Aikido seem as break dance fighting:

For grapplers physical conditioning comes with the territory. I know there is a lot of exertion involved with holding your sparring partner's hand in Aikido, but I'm gonna go out on a limb and say having a 200 pound dude balancing on your chest like a steroid induced ballerina does a lot more for your core than bending some limp wristed wimp's hand will. I'm not saying that any fighting style should require you to be built like the Hulk, and Jiu Jitsu is no different. Even Brock Lesnar with all those muscles and awesome acting- I mean fighting skills scoff- couldn't prevent someone with the build of Michael Cera from choking him with his toothpick-like arms.

The Gi. We grapplers don't require that our participants wear a dress when they fight as most of them are men and such impractical apparel doesn't transition well into the real world. Not to say I wouldn't mind having a pleasant breeze on my junk when fighting, I just don't like fighting in drag. The Gi, standard martial arts uniform, puts grapplers at a disadvantage by providing your opponent with more stuff to throw or choke you with. Apparently someone thought

TEENAGER DANGEROUSLY CLOSE TO BREAKING PINKY PROMISE

By Liz Fujita ~ Daily Bull

EAST LANSING, MI -- Sophia Alexis Ashleigh Donovan, a junior at East Lansing High School, revealed to the school counselor today that she is perilously close to breaking a long-standing pinky promise with her best friend.

The treachery is reported to be caused by the friend, who wished to remain anonymous. "Sue" allegedly danced to a slow song with the boy Ms. Donovan had "a humongous crush on" during the school's Winter Formal. In revenge, Donovan expressed her intent to reveal the Tragically Humiliating Algebra Class Incident of 2009 to the yearbook staff.

They swore on July 19th that the "totally huge secret" would never leave their lips -- but Donovan's heartbreak has led her to the ultimate threat of breaking their pinky promise.

Officials say Donovan could face a fine of three weeks of the cold shoulder and up to four days of name calling for the felony friendship offense. She is armed with lips and highly dangerous.

According to Donovan, the two "like, never fight." 🍷

visor of the duo, "It's astounding! If you look closely enough, the pixel appears on any image of anything! From bananas to fruit flies, super-nova to microstructures on the surface of metal, everything we see is made up of tiny pixels, too small for the eye to see. Uncounted trillions of the things surround us every day, and we're only noticing them now. If we could just learn to manipulate these tiny particles into different shapes, perhaps learn to disrupt and direct what binds them together we may be able to reconstitute matter into any shape, form, or color we like." Surely, this is one of the most momentous discoveries since the invention of the computer.

Most nano-particles require very high resolution, expensive imaging machines to view at all. Not so for pixels. Though it baffles all current experts in the field and seemingly defies the laws of physics, pixels are actually easier to view with .JPEG pictures taken by crappy, discount cameras on old, clunky, eye-cancer-inducing monitors. Fascinating stuff.

Equally intriguing, there appear to be several set kinds of pixels with their own unique properties just as there are a number of different elements which make up the periodic table. Already identified are Red, Blue, Green, Yellow, Orange, Cyan, White, and Black. Speculation as to why pixels form so drastically different than one another is already well underway, as well as many highly expensive tests to determine the properties of the differing types. The current, cutting edge results indicate they are different colors. More developments on this are sure to follow... At least, as long as the massive steam of funding continues to be supplied.

In related news, several neurologists have recently come up with a new classification method for describing the way memories are stored in sentient creatures. They call it a "bitmap". 🍷 snapping limbs in half wasn't enough and wanted to see if it was possible to strangle someone via Packers snuggie.

Chuck Norris knows Jiu Jitsu, and let's be honest here Norris > Segal.

As for weapons, well, we don't really need any do we? Seeing as how most muggers don't walk around with a katana, practicing disarming and beating the crap out of them with whatever weapon they did choose to bring might prove more effective. And in all seriousness who would practice with a wooden sword when they could get the same result with a plastic lightsaber (I'll take sound effects over splinters any day).

The Aikidoka defensive skills might best a Trojan condom but when it comes to attacking I'd be more afraid of that three legged puppy. Aikido moves are escape based, if you pull one off whilst fighting you'll just be giving your opponent another opportunity to bend you over and stick you with his "bokken". With Jiu Jitsu you can escape or attack giving you the option to end a fight on your terms. It's difficult for someone you just put in a coma to attack you (time for my favorite "stop hitting yourself" move).

Now I'm not saying Aikido is all bad, it does get you off the couch, and it's far better than watching Karate Kid and "waxing off" all the time. But what do I have to say to any Aikidoka that actually think they can take us on? Bring it. 🍷
