3 Little Pig Housing Development

Sam Schall ~ Daily Bull

Throughout the Keeweenaw Peninsula, a new housing development has been cropping out into the business of building good homes for the modern era and beyond. The company is owned by 3 brothers, triplets, and they share the business, each specializing in their own method of building.

The first brother specializes in brick home. He goes through the impractical mud brick house to the modern clay bricks. There are some advantages to this design, since it is far less likely to go up in flames from someone taking a blow torch to the side, and is decent when it comes to staying warm. The brick homes are also very stylish and modern looking compared to several other homes on your block.

The second brother has been working in the industry

University of Michigan to Host Stick Removal Clinic

By Liz Fujita ~ Daily Bull

ANN ARBOR – The University of Michigan announced earlier this week that they would begin hosting free clinics to help students combat a serious health threat that has been sweeping the campus since its founding. The department of health and wellness found strong evidence to suggest that a staggering number of students are experiencing severe discomfort and internal bleeding as a result of having sticks shoved so far up their asses.

"I first noticed the blinding pain during a Michigan – Michigan State hockey game about a week ago," noted one Wolverine. "I wasn't doing anything strenuous even. All I remember is it happened shortly after I said that State kids don't need to know how to add two plus two in order to get a degr—aaaaaaah!" He was interrupted mid-taunt by some internal discomfort.

spent at the university. More time wearing blue-and-yellow ("It's MAIZE, not YELLOW! We're too COOL for YELLOW-owwwwww!") interjected our interviewee) leads to the stick making its way further and further up the various bodily canals. "Ultimately, the stick gets jammed so far in there that their brains are permanently wired to be elitist forever," explained the lead physician.

Researchers have cautioned the surgical staff to use extreme caution when for a while now, specializing in wood studded homes and log buildings. These are very simple plans for your home, but very cozy and easy for those just needing shelter. This brother will work with you to cut cost in labor by teaching you how to build it yourself. While not being extremely nice to the environment when cutting down the wood for the logs and sticks, the building is very sturdy and will stay in the family for a long time.

The third brother works with hay and straw homes. While this doesn't sound like it would work and is easily blown down, it is actually very warm and is very hard to even burn down, despite the material going up in an instant. The hay homes are extremely cost efficient and very well insulated for those cold winters. The materials for the building are extremely friendly for the environment – being easy enough to just grow the hay – and those you have allergies will not have to worry, seeing as the hay is covered in a mud like substance to keep everything together.

These three brothers, again, are working together in the business, for the little man against the big bad wolf of the industry that is trying to steal your money by building really back, burn-able homes. These contractors are for the people. If you are looking for a contractor, go to Google, keyword: 3 Little Pigs.

removing the sticks from their patients. Some students, they say, are not ready to face the reality of growing their own spine instead of using their education as a surrogate. Others are at high risk of developing a post-partum depression upon realizing that the weird feeling is finally gone.

The pandemic of stick-butt syndrome

(SBS) has also reared its ugly head at schools such as MIT, Stanford, and The Ohio State University. A similar, sister-virus known as Swollen-Headitis also plagued Yale several summers ago, but was ultimately quashed. Many fear that Michigan's outbreak of SBS may be without cure, but a daring group here at our own Michigan Tech is working swiftly to discover an antidote to the problem.

"So far, our best solution is to make their sports team suck more," noted a Pep Bander who asked to remain anonymous. "They sure like to talk about that stuff. We might also sabotage their history department so that all the books say Hitler was from Brazil and made cookies for everyone."

So far, there have been an estimated

7,630 students affected by the stick-up-the-ass crisis. Classes will be cancelled on the days that students are invited to attend the clinic. The procedure, doctors note, should take no more than about 15 minutes. "All we have to do is grab the end and tug," a nurse explained. "Except for the very extreme cases, that should be sufficient."

What happens to the students who have managed to get so wrapped up in themselves that there is no way to remove the arrogant stick? "They will be treated as best we can and then locked in a psychiatric ward. There, several hundred Tech students have volunteered to teach them about having school spirit and enthusiasm without being insufferable. Godspeed, you guys."
