their classy image, and that means only a few different ethnic groups--all classy colors too. Teals like me are a very small minority that's shrinking every year."

He went on to say that even the trays that got jobs didn't always get work.

"Once you get sent to the bottom of the stack, you sit there for days until cleaning staff gets backed up at dinner-time or something like that. Even worse, the same workers often get chosen multiple times in a row, and it took this strike for Dining Services to finally set up a system to prevent it. There are workers who hadn't been paid much in months, and we weren't going to let that go on."

Further issues were with retraction of benefits after cuts in state funding to the university.

"I mean, first they take Trayless Tuesday away, then they slack off on everything they promised to give us in return," Cornelius snapped indignantly. "It just isn't fair."

Trayless Tuesday has been discontinued for some time now after students' complaints forced Dining Services to re-negotiate the labor contract that gave trays a day off each week.

Worst of all, he told us, dining hall employees had not been enforcing health department regulations that prevent trays from carrying food directly.

"We're plate-carriers," Cornelius said indignantly. "Carrying someone's fries that they just couldn't fit onto their plate is not only demeaning, but unhealthy. We're not food-safe like plates are. Plates can safely carry food, but every time we're forced to carry the stuff, it leeches essential chemicals out of us which end up in the metabolisms of whoever eats the food. Not only are we being forced to carry food--we're forced to become it!"

Historically, Dining Services will put up a flier from time to time reminding students to only put food on tableware that has been cleared by the health department, but no permanent notice has been placed as of yet.

Tensions between Dining Services and the DSPCU are nothing new. Back in 2007, a two-week strike ended in an agreement to start Trayless Tuesday in return for the union's promise to ensure their members stop taking side jobs carrying students down snowy hills.

"The work was great if you could find it," Cornelius said wistfully, "but Dining Services didn't like it one bit. A bunch of us would go out over the weekend on S.L.E.D. contracts and then we wouldn't all make it back in time for busy hours on Mondays."

He went on to say that though the pay was much better, the union had decided against moving their headquarters to Mount Ripley because jobs in the dining one crime against nature would create another one, such as a man starting to think like a woman."

"One possible solution, we are hoping, it to tap into the male's hardwired sex drive. With this warmer weather, the few single females on campus are beginning to wear less and less clothing, and soon enough it will be summer. Mini-skirts, tank-tops and bikinis will soon rule the area. In an isolated test, it has been found that when males getting the mutated Tech Effect are exposed to scantily clad women, their brainwaves go back to normal, and then...well...heart rate increases, and you get the gist of it from there."

When questioning some of the male population, there were varied responses. Some agreed with this, not willingly, but they became very upset when questioning continued and responded with "Well, it's not what you said, but how you said it!" and then huffed off.

And whatever you do, DON'T be like this guy... all the time... creepy...

Hopefully, there are still a few real men out there on this campus, somewhere, hiding in their rooms eyeing up the Sports Illustrated Swim-suit edition on an hourly basis in hopes to stave off this terrible effect. For your own good, single males of Michigan Tech, go watch some more porn, and turn off Lifetime, please! 🍌
