Female Friend-Zoned

by Olivia Zajac ~ Daily Bull

The unexpected has happened here at the hallowed, man-filled grounds of Michigan Tech. It seems that a girl has actually been placed in the friend-zone by a totally sane, straight male. She was found in hysterics being comforted by a multitude of other females with a barrage of ice cream, sappy Lifetime movies, and the option of a "sacrificial fire" for that "rat bastard turning you down". With the help of a translator (her sobs were so thick and loud we had no clue what she was saying), the scenario went something like this:

"I had a crush on him since he lived in the hall near mine and we used to do homework and get lunch together all the time and then we didn't see each other over summer and when I saw some other bitch talking him up I realized I was madly in love with him and then when I asked him out the asshole denied me and he led me on for SO LONG

Animal Affirmative Action Movement Leaves Easter Bunny Jobless

by Liz 'Riz' Fujita ~ Daily Bull

Following a recent movement by the ACLU and PETA, more animals are being offered the socially critical role of Easter mascot. Cultures the world over will need to seriously discuss this decision with their children, many of whom have grown up with the familiar face of the Easter Bunny greeting them every spring.

"America has made so much progress," said Tiffany Vanderhoeff, an ACLU representative. "Women can vote, people of every ethnicity are invited to work most places, and handicapped people have more accommodations made for them than any other demographic." But, said Vanderhoeff, other animals are starting to feel serious animosity toward the rabbit community.

Hallmark, ABC Family, and Jesus have agreed to work together on hiring the best possible candidate from a first-ever diverse pool. Especially strong contenders have been the armadillo, the flamingo, and a particularly charismatic cobra named Davis. But the outright winner for the position was the honey badger – applying on the basis of his skills at running really fast to deliver lots of eggs, he won the hearts of all three judges.

Not impressed, however, is the now-unemployed Easter Bunny. "After hundreds of years in this position, I can't believe it! This is an absolute outrage!" Not a proponent of affirmative action, the rabbit plans to sue Hallmark and ABC Family – he admits, however, that suing Jesus might violate some kind of moral code he agreed to when he took on the job in the first place. "This is disgraceful. There's no respect for people who work hard to do their job, lay eggs when their species isn't even supposed to be able to do that, and travel around the world bringing joy to kids. No one cares that I'm unemployed now. I have 78 children and 145 grandchildren – how am I supposed to provide a good future for them?"

When interviewed about his newfound employment as the official Easter mascot, the honey badger seemed unconcerned. "I'm just excited to have this opportunity!" he exclaimed, lumbering around with joy. "This is a great opportunity to show the world from The Next Step Is a Union on front how much fun our species can be. We have kind of a bad name, you know? People see us as vicious and stuff – but we're fuzzy, too."

The Easter Bunny, sitting in a local bar, drunkenly bemoaned his situation to the barkeep. "The ACLU doesn't care. The honey badger doesn't have any sympathy," he mumbled between swigs of $5 scotch from the bottle. "That asshole. Honey badger doesn't care. Honey badger don't give a shit."

The hiring cycle will continue every four or five years, so kids can look forward to the Easter Armadillo, the Easter Platypus, and the Easter Octopus. Those who want to apply should submit applications to bull@mtu.edu – happy holidays! 🍀 aaaauuuh I WANNA DIIIEEEE!" She then started crying even harder (somehow) and was ushered away by the pack of girls, all offering fake, yet comforting, sympathy.

This is but one side of the story. After tracking down the alleged "asshole" and "rat bastard" and "fuckface", he seemed like none of the horrible names the horde of women was calling him. He was happy to meet for an interview, and had this to say for himself: "Well, she was always kind of stalking me through Facebook and everything, and would suddenly show up at random places she wasn't invited to 'by chance'. She was nice enough, but I never had any intentions of dating her. I actually told her several times before she asked me out that we wouldn't be anything more than friends. I don't know what she was reading into, but I really think she's overreacting. I mean, I understand this is Tech and all, but come on. Just because you're female doesn't make you the most desirable thing on the planet here. There are always mail-order brides."

"I mean, she was trying to be super buddy-buddy to come across as likeable or one of the guys or something. But honestly, the turning point is when she farted in front of me. And not like a little poot that you could just laugh about. It was like Death itself was gaseously expelled from her ass. I think it actually burnt the chair she was sitting on. That's just not attractive. I'm all for girls being who they are, but come on. That's just fucking gross. It's really hard to see someone you haven't been dating for a long time as a sexually viable candidate after they rip ass that hard."

Believe whichever side you want to, dear reader, but it seems to me that women at this university cannot, in fact, get away with acting like dudes, and still expect to be seen as a woman. Who woulda guessed? 🍀
