iPad 3 Release Goes Mostly Unnoticed Due In Part to Video of Playful Cat

By Kyle Roe ~ Daily Bull

A video of a young house cat chasing the light of a laser pointer, which was posted on YouTube and many other sharing sites minutes before the release of the new Apple iPad 3, has captivated the nation. In a cute and adorable three minutes and fourteen seconds, the house cat named "Me-me" is seen running, pouncing, and rolling around in a futile attempt to catch a green laser light. Apple's new iPad 3, on the other hand, features a "retina display" 2048x1536 screen and 1080p video recording. In its first day available to the public, the Apple iPad 3 sold a ground breaking two units; while its main competitor the "young house cat chasing the light of a laser pointer" video landed an astonishing four decillion, two hundred nonillion, one hundred eighty-seven octillion, five hundred thirty septillion, nine hundred twenty-four sextillion, five hundred ninety quintillion, five quadrillion, one hundred are

Pic o' the Day - Stickynote of Doom!

From the Editor.:

One quiet winter's evening, there were 20 people huddled together in Walker for warmth. They had no food. They had no water. All they had were boxes containing weird, random things. So, to pass the time before they surely froze to death, they traded boxes. Inside one was the greatest tool of all - a magical blue square that could save any writer from the most evil of foes! Even a fierce, ruthless dictator's gleaming sword could be turned away by the square's power! And, here it is for you: our honorable pic o the day!

Michigan Tech Among the Best "Five Or So" WCHA Teams

by Liz Fujita ~ Daily Bull

Beginning today, Michigan Tech's hockey team will be playing in the WCHA's highly competitive, extremely honorable "Best Five-ish Teams" tournament. The WCHA (Woah! Cool Hockey Ahead!) will host the tournament all weekend. They told major sporting networks like ESPN15, Fox Sports (Dearborn campus), and the CBC that the Huskies made it as part of the University's new "We Can Drive 55" plan. Similar to 5-5-5 deals at Dominos or Herman "The Hurricane" Cain's 9-9-9 plan, We Can Drive 55 was put in place in 2007. The simple goal: Tech makes the final five in five years.

"We're proud to have really pulled through on the WCD55 plan," noted University Overlord Glenn Mroz from atop his gold-encrusted swan boat. "The secret 3rd five was that we take 5% of all tuition and pour it into hockey improvement. Wait. Could you not print that last part for the record?"

The Best Five-ish Teams tournament will take place in the less-loved twin, St. Paul, Minnesota. What's more, it will be held at the Bill Gates Microsoft Office Excel Energy Center, known locally as "where the Wild things are." Michigan Tech students are being encouraged to skip class on Thursday, Friday, Monday, Tuesday, and next Wednesday morning to support the team. Though the tournament ends on Saturday, Dining Services has offered a free cash bar on the MEEM 10th floor if the Huskies place well; Monday-Wednesday are to allow for students to drink copiously then pass out in the labs. "We figure having the students pass out in the labs due to intoxication rather than senior design will be a nice change of pace," said Mroz.

The tournament is single elimination, which means that Tech has to be on its a-game all weekend to avoid certain dishonor and Charlie the Unicorn level shunning. No one is too concerned, however. It has been scientifically proven that fans bringing Daily Bull vuvuzelas to the arena increase the team's chances of winning by at least 77.34%. What's more, in addition to the 5-5-5 plan, we have even more arcane powers on our side. During a top-secret interview in a pitch-black room, with his face shrouded by a forest-green cloak woven by Elves, one of the Blizzards anonymously told us that the reason Tech made the WCHA tournament is "Because Mel Pearson is awesome." He then vanished with a whirl into the night, presumably to go inspire the team in Minnesota.

Don Cherry even weighed in, dipping down from his Canadian fame to offer support for the WCHA tournament. Unfortunately, no one could hear his comment over the loudness of his suit. ☹ you still reading this? thirty-one trillion, four hundred billion, one hundred ten million, seven hundred seven thousand, and one views on YouTube.

When asked what made the video of a playful cat so appealing, and what made the iPad 3 so unappealing, entertainment industry specialist and star of "Epic Meal Time" Harley Morenstein had the following to say: "The iPad 3 plays the latest apps with the speed of a drugged up super leopard and has graphics so good I can jack off to porn for three weeks straight. However what it lacks is the childish innocence and frolicsomeness that only a house pet can have. Because of that the iPad 3 really has no use to anyone with a brain."

"[The video of a cat chasing a laser pointer light video] perfectly uses shaky, poor footage to critique the current social-economic situation in Denmark," praised Roger Ebert, an American Film Critique and Screenwriter of the college favorite: At the Movies with Gene Siskel, Roger Ebert, and a Pack of Six Old Saltine Crackers that are Too Dry to Eat

But We Might as well Serve Them with a Drink to Deal with the Fact that they are Too Dry to Eat. "By far the main reason why this video of a delightful house cat has reached such a large audience is that it is not a $499.99 tablet PC."

Though every person in the world (according to a survey taken by Professor Xavier and the Cerebro) agrees that the "young house cat chasing the light of a laser pointer" video is a "billion times more awesome than any Apple Product, especially the New iPad", the late Apple CEO Steve Jobs has publicly shown distaste in the video. "It is quite apparent to the Apple company as a whole that this scandalous video was created by our rival company Microsoft to sabotage our sales," stated Steve Jobs, who was rehired as CEO after being revived with the help of all but two new iPad's worth of Apple's production budget. When asked about this matter, Microsoft replied that they were too busy making products that actually sell to write any more of a statement than: "Don't worry Stevie-boy, we shot that video with an iPod Touch." ☹

In response to the iPad3-vs-Microsoft-Cat debate, developers of Ubuntu have quietly excused themselves from the scene to develop a product that combines the two. After extensive debugging and beta testing, they are hoping to release CatFad in late 2013; it will feature a slightly smaller screen than the iPad, a battery that will recharge ("nap") when the device is not in use, and meow obnoxiously when the user tries to touch the touchscreen in a way that doesn't do anything.
