Dohvahkiins Anonymous

By Rico Bastian ~ Daily Bull

It was reported earlier today that, despite numerous warnings from friends, first-year student Josh Peterson had started a new game in Skyrim.

"I don't see what the big deal is," Peterson told reporters without moving his eyes from the screen. "It's just a little Skyrim to relax after some studying."

After the first six hours of uninterrupted Elder Scrolls, Peterson's roommate Kyle Matthews decided to intervene before things got worse. He told him to come to eat, but instead of going to lunch, Peterson was brought to a Dohvahkiins Anonymous meeting.

"I couldn't just watch as he did this to himself," Matthews said. "I watched him do nothing but pick-pocket everyone in sight for two hours. That shit ain't right."

While Dohvahkiins Anonymous (D.A.), a mutual aid movement started shortly after the release of The Elder Scrolls V: Skyrim, has seen a decline in its numbers since this time last year, they are still committed to helping any Dragonborn come back to reality. Its numbers especially spike around finals time.

"Sometimes when you hear these stories, you begin to see the toll being a Dohvahkiin really takes on people and those around them," D.A. member Julio said. "I mean, there was this one guy who talked about going through an entire game using no weapons or

New Study Shows Fire Drills Dangerous to Students

By Veronica Tabor ~ Daily Bull

Several Michigan Tech students were hospitalized due to first-degree burns and smoke inhalation. The supposed cause of these injuries was a widespread fire in Wadsworth Hall. When questioned, the Housing & Res Life staff reported that a normal fire drill procedure was followed during the blaze. So, why were so many students not evacuated?

When questioned, the injured students reported that they thought it was just that - a fire drill.

"Normally when you hear the fire alarm, it's the standard procedure of standing outside in sub-zero weather in whatever you were lounging in five minutes ago. Then everyone files back inside and it's like nothing even happened. So this time, I figured, why bother? How was I supposed to know that it was real this time?"

This shocking confession from the student raises an interesting point: are fire drills actually putting us at risk? After all, why would anyone bother getting up and following procedure if nothing real actually ever happens?

Another student questioned agrees. "I was in the shower when I heard the alarm go off. At that point, I was not going to put a towel on and stand outside until a snowdrift formed over me and I was left to be discovered a week later. So, I just stayed warm and happy in the shower. It was good until the showerhead started spewing fire

Hey guys! It's broomball season! Holy shit! If you find yourself watching some night games on Wednesdays and need something to do after, come check out the Daily Bull - we meet at 9:15 in Walker 144 and would love to see what you find funny! ...as long as it's not /btardish

Mr. Anderson....welcome back.

I have six locks on my door all in a row. When I go out, I lock every other one. I figure no matter how long somebody stands there picking the locks, they are always locking three.

Tricking People Out of Their Money with Salsa and Coffee

By Chase Peterson ~ Daily Bull

Money, cash, gold, rupees, whatever you want to call it, I call it necessary to get things moving in this world. How are you supposed to get the permits pulled to build a decent underground lair, and don't even get me started on what it takes to get the zoning committee to approve an exception to get a helipad placed in an active volcano, always whining about safety, and workers rights. Don't they know that my workers don't have rights?! Philistines, the whole lot of them, and trying to bring the unions in to. . . what was I talking about again? Ahh, yes, tricking people out of their money.

There are really two ways to go about this task, so we are going to flip a coin to see which way this turns out. Heads have it, so we go with the more traditional route, and save the completely out there solution for a rainy day, or the next time they drag me out of the basement of Walker to write an article. In order to get this ball rolling we are going to need to set up a chip and salsa franchise to get a little revenue going. We are going to make these chips far too delicious for the average person to pass up, and every time they pass one of our stands they won't be able to resist those salty morsels dipped in hot tomato-y goodness. You may say something along the lines of "Great! He has found honest work and started his own business, he can finally get off this world domination kick." You people (like my mother) need to realize that Mad Science isn't just a job, or an idea - it's a calling, a way of life and for those lucky few of us that are called into the profession, our risks are some of the highest out there, but our rewards are so much greater than yours.

Moving on, we now have a source of seed capital for our next venture, religion. How can you use religion to trick people out of their money you might ask me? You would be a massive fool for asking that question. People pile into one spot, sing some songs, listen to someone speak and tell them how awful they are and how they need to spend more time and money helping out the church. It's all very cut and dry. Our 'religion', as some may call it, is really nothing more than a cult, the cult of the Chip and Coffee.

First we entice people into the fold with some of the best, free Colombian brew they have ever had. Now we have them all jacked up and wanting to listen so we start talking to them about how they need to spend time in our house of the one true Chip God. Once we have them sold on the Chip God, we can then extract all the money we need from them to finance the more important things that we will need in our arsenal, like dinosaurs, lots and lots of dinosaurs. ☹ instead of water. Then I figured it wasn't a drill."

It is interesting that something designed to keep us safer has actually injured so many students. But in reality, how often do fire drills result in actual fires? Last semester, it seemed as if it was actually a "gas-leak" alarm. And when students hear that alarm, they would much rather stay sucked into their futons rather than having to peel the Xbox controller off of their hand and go outside. So, it seems as if Michigan Tech students have begun to do this.

But, is this safe? Do students now realize the dangers of not taking the fire alarms seriously? "I figure, if it's like a 1/100 chance or something that it's a real fire when we hear the alarm, then last week was the 1 and I'm probably good for the rest of the year," one student says as he turns back to his 36" monitor.

Perhaps the classic cult ritual of fire drills will eventually end, and students will begin to take the alarm seriously. After all, it's only a matter of time before there is yet another gas leak. ☹

Something tells me the administrators never heard this story...

magic. All he did was punch. Who in their right mind would think to do that?"

D.A. is committed to helping even the highest level Nord to regain their focus and get their studying back on track. Through their twelve-step program, they have helped many mages and warriors alike return to reality.

Since finals are next week, we here at the Bull would like to encourage any and all students who are struggling with a problem similar to Peterson's to get the help they need at your local D.A. meeting over the weekend. ☹

The Twelve Steps of Dohvahkiins Anonymous

1. We admitted that we are powerless over Skyrim—that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that there is a Power greater than our duel-enchanted Daedric Greatsword (Legendary).
3. Realized that we don't need to harvest every plant we saw.
4. Dropped the goddamn dragon bones; we had more gold than we'd ever needed. You know what? While we're at it, dropped the fucking scrolls and potions too. When's the last time we used a scroll? Did we really intend on using that Potion of Waterbreathing? No, we fucking didn't.
5. We skipped this step.
6. Tried a multiplayer game with some other people, but not Super Smash Bros. Melee. That's just as bad.
7. Blamed a higher power for our addiction. If we didn't believe in one, we blamed someone else.
8. Rented a copy of The Shawshank Redemption. Watched it. Thought about how cool it would be to be in prison.
9. Gave our copy of Skyrim to someone else. Let it be their problem.
10. Placed a dead raccoon on our game console. This discouraged us from going near it.
11. ???
12. Profit!
