US to Sue Major Armstrong

by Jon "Big O" Mahan ~ Daily Bull

In a most outrageous case, the United States has decided to levy litigation against the super masculine, but quite fabulous, man known as Major Alex Louis Armstrong. The litigation comes after complaints that Armstrong is just too fabulous.

In the US people can sue over emotional damage. With claims that the man's mustache brings tears to children as he walks by, many are alleging he has caused them emotional damage. Armstrong however rebutted such comments, saying "But they bring tears of joy to the little children! They're happy, not being emotionally damaged!" Meanwhile, the US government has commented in reply to these statements, simply saying that "He never denied it didn't bring tears to children, regardless of cause, we believe we have a case here."

The government is also levying litigation against the buff man saying "No man can naturally grow hair in just that spot on the front of the scalp. The man must either be using hair regeneration techniques to selectively grow hair, or be using Nair to remove any hair that grows elsewhere. Armstrong again rebutted such allegations saying simply that since a boy, his hair has always grown like that and has never grown anywhere but there. Photo evidence seems to support him on this point; however the government believes he simply started very young.

Banana Hammocks Outlawed

by Elise Conley ~ Daily Bull

CANCUN, MX – As Spring Break approaches and Americans prepare to travel to warmer climes, tourism boards everywhere are beginning to express concern about some disturbing fashion trends. One of the first to issue an official statement, the Mexican Tourism Board confirmed today in a televised press conference that all male tourists coming in for Spring Break this year would be banned from wearing thong-style bathing suits, often referred to as "banana hammocks."

"To be quite honest," said MTB Chairman Jose Gonzalez, "the tiny little Speedo brief is not a good look. Perhaps one out of every 1000 men could really pull off the suit. I don't know where these men go for Spring Break, but it is most certainly not Cancun."

Gonzalez went on to discuss the safety of the mentality of Mexican children and families that frequent the beaches year round, as opposed to the tourists that migrate for a week each year.

America's Next Top Model runway coach J Alexander, a longtime advocate of clothing appropriate to the body wearing it, said string-bottom bathing suits for males creates a number of issues that can't be overcome.

"Visibility of excess body hair, the illusion that the man isn't wearing any sort of bottoms at all, that sort of thing," Alexander told the Bull. "But the worst would have to line machine of a man have begun to light up the twitter and blogospheres with comments in support or against the man. Ultimately the feeling out there is one of support for the man. Several however, have argued that the man is using steroids to get that buff. Though the government is not suing on these grounds, because Armstrong has never competed in a competition in which doping was illegal, they're not ruling out the possibility that he is perhaps defrauding people with his muscles. Top spokespersons for the government are saying that if the other litigation falls through, they may be forced to act on this, with the hope of recovering some of the money they deem to be fit retribution.

Armstrong himself is mostly ignoring the conflict, stating that he has more important business. His sister, usually very critical of the man and a leading general in the military, stated that she has never seen him use any product on his head and that she believes it's natural as it has run in the family. Indeed, the tuft/frond is present in 2 of her sisters. This reporter was able to verify these claims upon visiting the Armstrong estate and noted that both the mustache and the hair seem to go back down the Armstrong family line for generations.

Hearings on the litigation of his hair and his mustache are set to start on April 1, 2013. So far it is set to be the most popular trial in court at that time, and will likely be covered by the mainstream media news outlets. 🐘 be the incredibly disturbing One-Gun Salute!"

When pressed to elaborate on the One-Gun Salute, Alexander responded with a sassy "Oh no you DIH-INT!" followed by three snaps and an elaborate 'talk to the hand' motion.

Jonathan Parker, head of the US Fashion Policy Board has vowed to fight the ruling, stating, "Americans should have the right to wear whatever they like at the beach, whether they are fat and ugly or have more back hair than Larry the Cable Guy."

Parker also stated that Mexico "should probably be allowed to make whatever rules they want, since it is their country. But why can't they try to be more like Europe?"

However, members of the higher echelons of government disagree with the Fashion Board's opinion, going so far as to request that full coverage bathing costumes be brought back into style. A Congressman who wished to remain anonymous said, "It's disgraceful. It's disgusting. Modesty is a must. Wait—we were talking about men?"

In addition to the newest passport requirements that went into effect recently, the United States State Department is now requiring that all men travelling to Mexico carry at least one pair of board shorts, which must hang no less than one inch below the knee and a t-shirt that will not become see through when wet. If a traveler is without their board shorts and t-shirt, they could face hefty fines and even deportation and a ban from the country.

State Department spokesman Jacob Smith has expressed support for the Mexican ordinance saying, "Nothing good will ever come from American men sporting ass-floss bikinis on the beaches of Mexico. Nothing." 🐘
