Future Locations for Man vs. Wild

by Nathan "Invincible" Miller ~ Daily Bull

Man vs. Wild has been off air for what seems like an eternity, when in reality they haven't been putting out new episodes since late 2011. Even still, the Bear Grylls mentality remains etched in my mind. Where would I go if I were Bear? What innocent woodland creature would I eat? Here are a few places that Bear Grylls could still venture.

Mall of America. With millions of square feet of shopping area open to explore, Bear must make his way through each of the 5 anchor stores, gathering food along the way. Survival is dependent on his ability to steer clear of angry children, overweight parents, and shopaholic tweens that could tear a man clean in half with a single swipe of their talons.

Korean DMZ. On top of finding clean water and edible critters, Bear must dodge bullets and evade capture along the highly militarized stretch separating North and South Korea. Bear monkeys with derelict equipment leftover from the war, narrowly escaping injury after detonating an active anti-tank mine.

Nuclear Power Plant. Food and clean water are scarce commodities for Bear this episode. Tasked with escaping the reactor room and making his way to the pickup point at the top of a 350 foot tall cooling tower, Bear risks everything when he mistakes a spent fuel pool for a unassuming hot spring.

Virgin Alternative Spring Break

by Jeremy "Mr. Sunshine" Loucks ~ Daily Bull

It's March, and college students across the nation know what that means: Spring Break. Hundreds of thousands of students will gain a temporary reprieve from classes, and many will spend the time partying in exotic locations. Some stay at home and catch up on sleep, reading, and video games. Still others sign up for service projects, building homes, visiting the elderly, or missionary work. These "alternative spring breaks" are becoming increasingly popular.

Richard Branson, eccentric billionaire founder of the Virgin empire, is hoping to cash in on the recent trend. Branson, who is helping to launch the space tourism industry, is a logistics guy. In his most recent interview, he explained his idea for an interesting "alternative spring break."

"You see, space tourism is about to take off. We're going to be sending hundreds, and then thousands of people up to explore the space surrounding our little rock here. These tourists are going to lure other corporations to the stars. McDonalds already has plans to open up a restaurant on the International Space Station. Starbucks wants a shop on a comet. Hell, the NHL is talking about expanding to include a lunar team, the Whalers. All of this money and greed going to space makes me a bit sick.

So, what's the point of this talk? What are all of these tourists going to be producing? TRASH. Think of it.

The first panacea for a mismanaged nation is inflation of the currency; the second is war. Both bring a temporary prosperity; both bring a permanent ruin. But both are the refuge of political and economic opportunists.

Disney World. Between hopping across roller coaster tracks and skipping giant lines to the grub shack, Bear must withstand the blistering Florida heat and immense travel distances across the park. When the power goes out in Space Mountain, Bear faced with a choice: save himself and get out alive, or stay behind and console small children, risking his life in the process.

Abandoned Metro. Bear is challenged to survive the dark and dangerous abandoned metro stations beneath the streets of New York. Bear must endure constant bombardment by rat feces and hobo harassment while avoiding subway cars barreling down the tubes from all directions.

Set of Honey Boo Boo. Possibly his most difficult encounter yet, Bear is faced with no other option but to collapse the entire house on top of the fat slugs in order to make a break for it. One false move and he'd suffer a fate worse than death – a life stuck in a fantasy world where pigs are raised as children and are spoon-fed lard by their overbearing parents. He's gotta get out of this one alive!

The Moon. With a limited amount of oxygen and a few other key survival tools, Bear must construct a spaceship, harvest ice from deep within lunar craters to create fuel, and escape to his near-Earth orbit pickup point. Bear will need to use all of his survival training to help him survive this hostile environment. 🐻

Straws moving at hundreds of miles a second. Spilled lattes destroying sensitive computer equipment. AN-OTHER NHL TEAM in the desert (of the moon)! No janitor is going to want to work in weightless conditions. Thus, we had to think outside of the box. Kids on Spring Break! They volunteer to collect tourist trash, we send them to space for a week! It's a win-win. Now, excuse me as I drink this 100 year old scotch out of this priceless Ming vase."

Branson's program, tentatively slated to start in 2015, will require a 2-month training process, including weightless training, jetpack use, and learning how to adequately use one of those sticks with the claw on the end, to actually collect the trash. Candidates are already filling out applications, some of them before they graduate middle school. 🐻
