Non-Asshole Discovered On Twitter

by @twit4lyfe

In a discovery that has reverberated throughout the "Twitterverse," researchers at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology have turned up a Twitter user who is apparently not a narcissistic asshole.

"It was widely assumed that Twitter was being used exclusively by self-centered navel-gazers with an unrepentant desire to share their every thought and action with whoever would listen," said MIT Professor Ron Sharkowski, who led a six-week study of the "micro-blogging" service that allows members to communicate in 140-character tweets. "But in at least one instance that seems not to be the case."

The instance in question is that of Mr. Karl Montesquieu (a.k.a. @montyQ92) of Boscobel, Wisconsin, who has been a Twitter member since early 2008 and tweets almost exclusively useful tidbits of information, like the weather in the greater Madison area and important news blurbs. According to Prof. Sharkowski, Montesquieu has never used his tweets to say what he was doing at that moment, which TV shows he thinks suck or anything about "SXSW."

"That's a music festival," said Sharkowski. "I looked it up."

Montesquieu, reached at Maggie Magoo's, the candy and ice cream shop he manages in Boscobel, says he wasn't trying to stand out from the Twitter crowd.

World domination is exhausting and cliché. People ought to just focus on being individual responsible citizens of the earth instead of assholes.

I Like Meat.

by Abigail Skibowski ~ Daily Bull

Thursday, March 28, 2013

Once upon a time, a very dark time, I thought it was a great sang. There were butterflies as I lifted the fork to my mouth. At that moment, I fell in love. It was the best thirty seconds of my life. There was a symphony of beauty as I explored the flavors of the meat. It felt so natural, so right. Tears were streaming as I devoured the remaining portion of heaven. What was left on my plate was the minimal evidence of a love affair that I had with the glorious chunk of meat.

I have no idea what possessed me to order my now favorite food at a fancy restaurant, but I let it happen. There was something inside of me, silencing my eco-friendly, hippie mind. The anticipation was killing me. All I could think of was a giant slab of cow. Of course I ordered it with a red center.

After waiting what seemed a century, the beast presented to me on a platter of beauty. It was paired with a side of garlic mashed potatoes, a dream in themselves but nothing compared to the steak. The steak was garnished with some green specimen, but I had no patience for the unnecessary, the fancy. I only had eyes for the brown sixteen ounces.

I eased my knife into the meat. It was like butter. It felt so good. The ruby, warm juices started running. My heart was out. I called my parents right after I was done. That, ladies and gentlemen, is why it is so important to eat what you love and do what makes you feel good.

"I just thought maybe I could be helpful," he said. "I figure there's not much point in sending out every personal thought or opinion, no matter how mundane or uninformed," he added, espousing a view apparently not shared by Twitter's 4-5 million other users.

"This guy's giving the rest of us a bad name," e-mailed @LaLaLady44, one popular "Tweep" prone to tweeting about which pair of underwear she's wearing, how much liquor she's drunk or plans to drink and whether or not her nipples are feeling sensitive. "What he's doing is not what Twitter is supposed to be about. BTW, I'm wearing my pink thong today, and it's riding up my butt."

In fact, some longtime Tweeps point to Montesquieu as evidence that the service is no longer the cutting-edge social media tool it was a few months ago.

"I'm sorry to say it, but Twitter has definitely jumped the shark," said popular user Chris Manfredo, a.k.a. @ChrisManf, a marketing executive with 2,076 followers. "It's so like SXSW in that way."

Manfredo says he's looking forward to what many say will be the next big social media sensation, Utter, launching later this year. That service will require members to communicate only in one-word "Utes," like "Bored" or "Horny."

"Pumped," explained Manfredo.

Another popular Twitter user, @Bargains4U, declined to comment, instead responding with several hundred links back to his/her website. ☺

Pic O'The Day!

(Yeah, just keep looking, it's not like I'm watching you (How many more of these damn parenthetical statements is he going to use? Just end it already! (But they are so fun. . . . fine, this is the last nested parenthetical, I promise... (For now!)))) brand of offbeat comedy that was one part live show, one part slapstick humor and two parts homespun engineering. The kind of engineering that your drunk uncle Dave raves about how he managed to fix his truck with a Q-tip and a bonsai tree and you just stand there scratching your head while your well-pickled relative explains the finer nuances of getting a bonsai tree to act as a muffler, but we all know you're never going to get it.

Looking at the MET program and having become deeply involved with the course work, I can say (and I hope my instructors have a really good sense of humor) that Red Green is the guiding light of the MET program. Less so with the slapstick humor (although I do have one professor who... never mind) and more to do with the outside of the box thinking that they encourage and the homework they assign.

It seems like much of the coursework is geared to the practical side of the engineering field, much like our beloved leader Mr. Green. While we are learning about loads in either static or dynamic equilibrium, one need only look as far as the handyman's corner to see the applications of these principles. Need a refresher on the laws of physics and Newton's equations? Adventures with Bill has you covered. Feeling socially inept? Just look at Harold and you will feel like Casa-freaking-nova. And for those of you that make it out and make it to old age and need a little more advice on what's happening, then you want the North of 40 segment.

Everything an aspiring MET student needs to know can be found in the Red Green show, so on behalf of myself and the rest of the Daily Bull Staff, remember, we're pulling for you, we're all in this together, and keep your stick on the ice. ☺

Red Green: Lighting the way for the MET Program

by Chase Peterson ~ Daily Bull

Red Green is the greatest engineering technologist alive today. For those who are unaware of this god among men, this titan of the proverbial ivory tower, allow me to bring you out of the Dark Ages and into enlightenment! Red Green is a Canadian born engineer and TV star—along the lines as Rowan Atkinson or Dolph Lundgren, but without the master's degree.

He graced PBS with his own special (and I mean paste eating special (not to say that paste is bad, heck I had my fair share of it, and look at me now!
