Student Still Eating Thanksgiving Leftovers

by Elise Conley ~ Bull Architect

A local student was dismayed to learn last night that he would be having a dry turkey and cranberry sauce sandwich for the sixth meal in a row. Daniel Brooks, a student from Calumet, is on his sixth full day of eating nothing but Thanksgiving leftovers.

"The first couple of days were fine, I mean, at least I still had mashed potatoes, green beans, stuffing, and gravy. But now, all that's left is the cranberry sauce and turkey. The worst part is, though, the turkey just keeps getting dryer. I went through a full gallon of water on my last sandwich, and I was still parched after eating. I just don't know how much more of this I can take." The junior has been salivating over Dominoes ads since Saturday, saying that it couldn't hurt to look.

His mother, with whom he lives, keeps finding new ways to spruce up the leftovers. When asked about the quantity of turkey remaining, she simply dissolved into hysterical laughter and disappeared into the kitchen sobbing. "For dinner we're having turkey with a side of 'fucking eat the goddamn turkey.' How much meat can be on a single eight pound bird? Fuckin' ridiculous. And all they do is bitch about the turkey. Well, if you'd eat the turkey on Thanksgiving Day instead over watching the fucking Packers game, maybe there would be less turkey left, ever think about that? And the game this year wasn't even worth watching. Both teams should have lost."

For now, Brooks will continue eating his turkey. In other news, students still

Your Love Life and The Second Law of Thermodynamics

by Sam K ~ Staff Writer

Being part of this "school of engineers" (you may not be one but over half the students are according to this last semester) I feel that we tend to apply our classes where ever we can. Car gets stuck? Think of physics class and how to increase friction. Heating bill too high? Figure out the best times to turn the heat down to reduce leaking heat. We have to do this because, lets face the reality, otherwise most of this will only be used for some test at the end of school. In honor of getting the most bang for your buck I bring to you a way to apply your thermodynamics to something useful! Like dating! So here are the laws of relationships according to the second law of thermodynamics. (For those of you who don't know what that is it's basically saying that everything moves from a more ordered state to a less ordered state. Like rednecks.)

Attractiveness equilibrium

You may always wonder how she ended up with him or why he's with her. It seems so wrong that the universe would but such different things together. The implications of the second law are that: "Attractiveness of couples will degrade into equilibrium." Let's just hope our significant others are pulling us up on this one. Over the years of being together couples begin to look like each other, something to do with reflective muscle contraction when you see their face, so you either need to keep pictures of Brad Pitt or Angelina Jolie, or you'll end up looking like your significant other. Seriously though, the traits that make one sex attractive are unbecoming on the other sex. So your children are going to be about the average of how attractive you both are. Tough luck for Brad and Angelina's kids.

Just like the first point the passion's you share will fade as well. Maybe it's the extra weight you put on, or that you just don't try as hard, or that you simply don't have a good attention span but things will simmer down. Sorry, The Notebook just isn't going to happen ladies. Humans simply cannot sustain such an emotional state that long and isn't that just a bit stalkerish? I mean if she wasn't into it that'd be super creepy but she likes it so it's super romantic?

Availability equilibrium:

Finally some good news! According to thermodynamics not only will the long odds for everyone at tech balance out but everyone will have an opportunity to find a date. Let's be honest, after all those failed dates or rejections via Facebook, you needed this little bit of hope. This also means that once you're in a relationship your potential to date anyone one else slowly and inevitably decrease. That might be good news or bad news depending.
