Aquaman Summons Cthulhu

After his dishonorable discharge from the Justice League for being "useless", Jordan de Vito (AKA Aquaman), was reported to be seen in the company of some suspicious looking characters two weeks ago. It was reported that gold changed hands for old library books from the Miskatonic University's private and dangerous book collection.

When his friends were asked about his dismissal from the Justice League they stated that de Vito was extremely depressed and lashing out at everyone who tried to help him. "Man it was just bizarre," one of his friends said, "he was ranting and raving about how all the members of the League could go shove it, and how Batman and Superman were making 'backroom' deals with each other to get him kicked out". Another source close to de Vito reported that he was throwing starfish and vampire souids at children in the park screaming "Ph'nglui Mglw'nafh Cthulhu R'lyeh wgah'nagl fhtagn." as his mental state continued to degrade.

It was later discovered that the two books that were missing were The Necronomicon and The King in Yellow. The Necronomicon is an ancient tome that is reported to be written by Abdul Alhazred, The Mad Arab around the year 700 BCE. Its contents are supposedly ancient rituals for summoning demons along with the history of "The Old Ones", an ancient race of creatures that ruled the Earth long before humans had begun to evolve from their primate ancestors. The King in Yellow is a play of unknown origin and indeterminate age that has been utilized multiple times to either incite madness in a given population, or to generate a plague in a given area.

After the episode on the playground, de Vito was reported to be seen studying star charts and exclaiming

Mirror World Discovered Beneath the Portage

by Alex Dinsmoor ~ Editor-in-Chief

Scientists of the new Great Lakes Research Center (you know, that new building between the DOW and the Portage?) have announced that below the portage there actually exists a murky "mirror world", which is similar to our terrestrial Houghton-Hancock but inverted, and soggy.

"The evidence suggests some sort of super symmetry," their spokesman announced, water bubbling out of his esophagus and pouring out in an unending, fishy-smelling stream from his lab-coat as he spoke. "The world below the Portage appears to match the world above, except for minor details such as atmosphere and moral inversion. We have determined that the environment is perfectly safe, and the denizens are likely very friendly." There was then a left-handed ribbon cutting ceremony on the Great Lakes Research Center's new "Portal to the Unknown" promotional tour facility.

In related news, the City Councils and Michigan Tech Board of Directors recently announced that attendance to the Portal to the Unknown promotional tour facility is now mandatory for all civilians and students. "The tour includes lungs-on exhibits and re-educational lectures, and is sure to inspire the joy of learning in young and old alike!" they said, in a prepared statement to the Daily Bull, written in foul-smelling sediment on our office walls.

We attempted to interview representatives of the City Councils and the Board of Directors in person, but were that 'the time of the Old Ones was nigh'. Shortly after the proclamation, the Great Old One Cthulhu was seen to be rising from his slumber in his house beneath the wave in R'lyeh. I for one welcome the madness and eventual orgy of destruction that will inevitably follow, perhaps it will get me out of my fluids midterm.

unable to reach them for comment because of chronic flooding. Indeed, both city halls and the Great Lakes Research Center are currently flooded, despite being well above the water level and several stories tall. In defiance of gravity, fluid dynamics, and surface tension, the buildings were full of water. Luckily the people inside did not seem adversely affected, and were comfortably going about their business, as far as we could see through the water-streaked windows and murky interiors. Of course, we could not locate the Michigan Tech Board of Directors in their secret underground bunker—that is how secret underground bunkers work, you know. But we asked for them over the intercom, and their reply was too garbled by the water flowing out of the speaker and soaking into our shoes for us to make out much information. However, we are confidently declaring that their secret bunker is flooded as well!

In unrelated news, the city councils have also decreed that all traffic must now drive on the left side of the road, in preparation of our new mandatory guests. I bet they're Europeans! §

Subreddit of the Week: /r/MTU

by Kara Bakowski ~ Secretariat

Show a little school spirit! If you reddit, there's no reason to at least subscribe and make us seem like a big school in the reddit community. Right now, there are usually a few posts a week, but it is a slowly-growing subreddit that has a lot of potential. The current postings are usually relevant and somewhat interesting, there just aren't many of them.

But that's where you come in! Post silly things you see around campus, questions you're too scared to ask your RA, or shed light on events that are happening in the community that students may not know about otherwise.

Because of the amount of potential first years that post asking "what is there to do at a school in the middle of nowhere?", /r/mtu is a great place to shamelessly promote the activities you participate in. Whether you're a theatre enthusiast or an intramural star, there are plenty of opportunities to recruit freshmen before they even know how awesome you are.

PS: if you're familiar with CSS, I hear the mod team is looking for people to help with a new snazzy theme! Apply within. $
