New Game Review: Far Cry 6

Soul-ja BOI

I have always been a huge fan of the Far Cry series. The new one just recently came out, about a month ago and it's ruining my life. I used to have a decent social life and would hang out with friends regularly. When I'm not with friends, I would call old highschool friends or would reflect. Ever since this game was released, I had not had the time to take a shower. I ran out of cologne and fe-breeze and I'm about to order bulk on Amazon. My friends were so concerned, that they broke into my apartment and dragged me out to watch the snow. It's been about 24 hours, and I am writing about the game.

The game is set in some fictional Spanish speaking—I don't understand what's going on it—islands and is ruled by a dictator "El Presidente". The same guy from Breaking Bad, Giancarlo Esposito. He looks pretty badass. Anyways, according to the plot, he is the bad guy? From the hero's perspective, El Presidente is enslaving workers for his tobacco fields and creating a new stable economy. You see, from the hero's perspective, El Presidente is a dictator, but from my eyes, El Presidente is just a very kind and loving person. He isn't enslaving workers for his tobacco fields more like hiring. Libertad, the guerrilla movement against El Presidente's regime (Castillo) is fucking everything up. As the guerilla in Libertad, I have this weird ass looking jet pack that has an ultimate move—shooting jizz rockets at the Castillo's forces. It is just such an amazing game because the game requires soooooo much looting. Screw fighting, loot! You want me to fight Castillo, the best president that treats his people so well? No, I would rather keep looting than progress. I know I haven't gotten very far in the plot and I don't intend to. If the game tells me to stop looting, I'm throwing this game out. But I would do this 10/10 again.
