Small Town Astonished as Local Satire Newspaper Publishes Article Almost Half as Funny as The Onion

Fake ID-Maker

Richard Johnson

On the morning of September 31st, The Daily Bull left the residents of Houghton, MI stunned after their most recent issue contained an actually funny joke. "It was completely unprecedented," claimed one pallid local wrapped in a shock blanket "I mean, it wasn't even today's issue. I just ran out of stuff to do and got so bored I thought - hey, maybe I'll check out what The Daily Bull is up to, because at least reading whatever pitiful garbage they put out makes me feel a little less useless. But coming onto the second paragraph of the article, there was... There was this jab at the university president and... I let out an amused puff of air and... and... Oh God!" Word of the offending article was soon known to all Houghton residents. Amidst the chaos, we pulled aside one seemingly unbothered man and asked his opinion.

"Yeah, it's honestly kind of confusing for me. Nobody really wants to read

The Daily Bull, it's just there, you know? There's this guy in my Global Issues class who writes for them and I hit him up the other day sayin' - 'Hey man, that article's got the town really shaken.' - and he kinda chuckled and replied 'not stirred?' like that was supposed to be funny. It's not! And that's how The Daily Bull is supposed to be. Something's not right. There's rumors of Divine intervention. My pastor thinks it's the rapture." The man then proceeded to EconoFoods to stock up on various non-perishables.

Attempts were made to get ahold of The Daily Bull staff, however any interview questions were met with replies of "your mom."

Students Forget Common Cold Exists: Told to Self Isolate For Sniffles

A Sickly Man doing a sick wheely

Hallways, labs, and lecture halls all are filled with the sounds of coughing, wheezing, throat-clearing, sniffing, and sneezing, and it's causing many sidelong glances. It appears some students recently have fallen ill with a minor bug that causes mild congestion, exhaustion, and coughing that sticks around for way too freaking long (so help me God I will take all of the drugs until this shit goes away I'm so done with it), and it's causing some minor distress among other students.

"It sounds like a goddamn hospital," one student named Chloe Aecha said. "Just like my grandfather. Everyone's always wheezing and coughing and sniffing; just like: You've got the Rona, WTF you doing in class? Stay home!"

"This is ridiculous. Everyone's always coughing and sniffing, and I can't focus. Class is supposed to be dead silent— anyone who coughs should be send to the morgue." K. David said in disgust after walking out of Fisher 135. "It was never like this before COVID."

Ever since COVID started, the strain has slowly been forming a monopoly on any and all symptoms related in any way to respiratory or sensory functions. It made it's mark with loss of taste or smell, but then quickly gobbled up coughing, shortness of breath, and fever. A couple shrewd deals with Big Pharma let it pick up runny nose, congestion, and sore throat, and a major merger back in Novemburary added diarrhea to COVID's already intimidating roster.

This has left smaller players, including the common cold, on the sidelines, feeling forgotten. People forget the once-dominant force in making fall unpleasant: the Cold was the master of the sniffles and the runny nose. As it's being forgotten, people are attributing it's bread and butter to the new coronavirus in town, and innocent, sick students bear the brunt of the blowback.
