God Spams Ctrl + Z to Undo His Mistakes

Schottky Hotkey

Heaven (Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth)-God was sitting at his computer today, playing his game of Civilization MMXXII, when he realized his save was utterly unsalvageable. A bunch of his rulers just died, nigh-on half a continent was embroiled in wars after completely unrelated countries screwed them all over and then just left, and the game world itself was folding in on itself as the global temperature rapidly climbed. And all this was on top of a pandemic effectively ramping the game difficulty up to a Heavenly 11. So, using his divine powers, God created an undo button and used his autoclicker to roll back the game to a suitable state.

Initially, changes happened slowly. Elon Musk disowned twitter and bought Truth Social, not long before a billion missing snow crabs rained down from the sky above Alaska. Liz Truss walked back into 10 Downing street just in time to witness the Queen burst out of her casket in a T-pose and return to Balmoral castle. It was around this time that God realized the Ctrl+Z function might have some bugs to work out, but it was too late now, as the changes were picking up pace.

Bitcoin suddenly was everywhere, and the crypto-bros continued to annoy everyone. People gained hundreds of hours of their life back from Elden Ring. Everyone was suddenly sporting the work-from-home patented button-down-underpants combo wombo. For a brief moment, the Ever Given jammed itself back into the Suez before clipping through the map and flinging itself across time and space. The Josh's met for a peaceful afternoon tea as aged memes like Pepe the Frog and Ugandan Knuckles flashed across computer screens. They became Vines, then Bad Luck Brian fused with Sans, written Comic Sans and aired on MTV.

Planes fell out of the sky as they only had one set of wings and were powered by Cornelius on a bicycle peddling from the world's fair.

China was briefly stoned before Napoleon came back for Waterloo II, this Germany thing is new. A bunch of Catholic ambassadors jumped back into windows in Prague, before they got an idea to go retake the holy land with Prester John. Kukulcán flew apart as Viking ships unburned themselves and sailed back into port, blocking the Ever Given from docking. God released the button, but it had input lag and undo's kept happening even faster.

The mighty Empire of (Ro)Man(s) unbroke itself, then rebroke itself, then unbroke itself again and rebroke itself again. Some kid named Alex woke up pretty hungover somewhere around Iran. Democritus shoved atomic theory in Aristotle's face, and feathers flew back onto one specific chicken that then squawked its way out of the academy in Athens. There was a traffic jam on the Bering land bridge, as people made their way back to world spawn. Some squirrel managed to break whole icebergs with an acorn as a bunch of humans and relatives spawned in and teleported to Africa. Sloths got giant, elephants got hairy, and cats grew long teeth, before the Toba supervolcano did a big succ. Terror birds hatched from the eggs in your refrigerator, and God realized he had committed the third classic blunder: not putting a break-out case in his while loop. Desperate to recover his game as the dinosaurs worked on a massive catapult to launch the meteor back into space, he did one easy trick doctors don't want you to know about: reloading his last autosave.

“Dedicated” Student Drops Classes After 44 Minutes

Big Sephiroth, Somber Sombrero

Local Computer Science major Liam Trust gave up on going to all 3 of his Friday classes before the first class even ended following a realization that he actually does not give a shit about linear algebra, which is leading to his own failure of the class. Trust was in the classroom for just 44 minutes, making him the first to leave the class and earning uptight scoffs from the students who think they’re better than him for remaining for 6 minutes longer. He said in a statement outside of Fisher Hall, “We set out a vision for at least an AB, taking advantage of the professors office hours and the math learning center. I recognize, though, given the situation, I cannot deliver the mandate on which I signed up for this class. I have spoken to my professor to announce that I am skipping the rest of my classes today.”

Liam is now due to complete 7 weeks worth of assignments in the next day, much faster than the 7 goddamn weeks he already had. His academic advisor told reporters she was now looking at what the lowest grade he could get on his final in order to pass the class, including the assumption that he got an A on every assignment proceeding: 237%.

In Liam’s absence, another student stepped up to the task of being a dedicated student, head of the classroom. Their name is Tushi Sumac, so called because of an unfortunate incident involving a certain poisoned woody structure. Sumac initially refused to go to a Climate panel put on by the Egyptian Student Organization, and received much criticism. “I already hear about it in all my HASS classes” Tushi initially said, electing instead to focus on the academic catastrophe Trust left behind, but in a recent interview changed their tune. “I don’t know who this ‘Climate Change’ fellow is, but people seem to be really passionate about it and it’s obviously a really really huge deal that we all should unite to solve, even if that means putting aside other differences and overcoming personal biases”.

The Bull is watching this tumultuous time for the CS department, who honestly could hardly care less so long as Trust continues to pay tuition. The situation is developing quickly as the next exam approaches, which is expected to be the second big test of Sumac’s “cashews”.
