Man Fights Lake; Wins

Moistened Nicky

Forty-seven years ago, a terrible event struck the people of this great country. The SS Edmund Fitzgerald fell prey to the storms of Lake Superior and sank to its deep dark depths.

Forever entombed in a watery grave, or that's what I would say had a spectacular not occurred recently. Last night at 4:57 pm, one man took it upon himself to exact vengeance on this vast menace we call a lake. Walter Bahd, a first-year computer science student, has long held a hatred for the immense body of water known as Lake Superior after he went swimming one time and felt cold afterward.

After speaking with Walter, I found out about the story of what he did to this Lake. Last night Walter was working on a program at Prince's Point when all of a sudden a large gust of wind appeared and swept his laptop off his legs and into the water nearby. When Walter received his laptop, he discovered that the water had destroyed and ruined his most prized possession, his laptop. This was the last straw for Walter. The lake had taken far too much from him. With this, he approached the water and started punching and screaming wildly at it. One can only imagine the sight of a grown man splashing the water with his fists of rage and a face of red. Something peculiar happened though. Instead of the Lake being as uncaring as always, it seemed to recede slightly. It was no longer as close to shore as it usually was. This led to Walter concluding that he had the power to defeat Lake Superior once and for all. With this newfound motivation, he got to work. He threw haymaker after haymaker at his liquid rival and gradually the lake started to recede more and more. It took him according to his account, 27 haymakers to make the lake finally concede total and utter defeat. After waving the metaphorical white flag, it went back from whence it came and disappeared once and for all. With the newfound land before him, Walter stood breathless but victorious. We can now finally take back what has been stolen from us throughout the ages from the giant fiend once known as Lake Superior. Some people are not so happy about this turn of events though. Critics of what Walter has done have claimed things like, "This will greatly affect the trout population," and "A lack of available water in the area will make it much harder to grow plants." Despite what these imbeciles believe, I think we, the people of the Keweenaw, should be proud of ourselves for showing nature who's boss. When life gives you water, don't take it. Make life take the water back. Burn down life's house with the water. MAKE LIFE RUE THE DAY IT THOUGHT IT COULD GIVE US ALL WATER.

Election Ads Suck A Whale's Willy

Grendel Dixie

I had been saying it for weeks before this past Tuesday: Boy, I can't wait for elections to be over. I was so sick and tired of not being able to get news without seeing something about midterm races. Even when I tried to take a break from it all by watching edu-tainment videos about carcinization and transhumanist philosophy, I'd be assailed constantly by bullshit scummy attack ads. "Tudor Dixon would ban abortion with no exceptions, no exceptions..." has become seared into my ears, mostly because every single ad used the same two Dixon voice clips. Why did it have to be the same damn clips every time? Because apparently, the whole "no exceptions even for health of the mother" thing isn't even Dixon's platform— so the ad is only half true. Shocker.

After being subjected to the endless political ads— from both main parties- I pondered what exactly about them annoys me so much. Maybe it's that they're completely dishonest, paid for by PACs or by the parties and are therefore a totally biased source aiming solely to manipulate the viewer. Maybe it's because they're wholly uncreative and uninteresting to view in the first place, but they paid the premium to make them un-skippable on YouTube. Or maybe it's because I saw them so. Many. Times. Unironically my favorite ad I've seen in the past three months was a single Secretary of State ad that aired on election day. It explained how counting of absentee ballots can't begin in Michigan until two days before election day, so expect official tallies to still take a while. Whether it was the mildly passive-aggressive tone of the narrator explaining that rule, or that the ad was genuinely helpful and informative, or the fact that I only was forced to watch it once, it was so nice I legitimately stopped what I was doing and took a second to appreciate this one sweet breath of fresh air.

Despite my hopes on holding on until after the election, I realize I can never escape. Not only is election-denying bullcrap probably going to prolong this bout of suffering, but some people are already talking about the 2024 Presidential election, as if they hadn't been talking about elections since this January. Give us a break!

Voting is the bare minimum duty of a US citizen. There are so many more things to do, but even just researching candidates and voting wears me out. Is that by design? Is it some scheme to disengage voters and keep the powerful people in power? Is it a necessary evil? I don't know! Just stop running ads four months ahead of time on my math videos god dang it.
