Confounding Variable Found in Marijuana-Diarrhea Link

Hazel Sprotitsy

In a recent study, 420 randomly selected MTU students were, on the condition of anonymity, asked about their marijuana use and frequency of explosive diarrhea*. After plotting the results, a strong linear association was discovered between marijuana and explosive diarrhea, which came as a surprise to the researchers. Many supporters of the substance have spoken out against the study, claiming, “nahhhhh mann ain’t no way – that’s sum bullshiitt”. Regardless, the dean of students recently sent out an email concerning the use of drugs on campus – and seemed rather enthusiastic about it – although the connection between marijuana and explosive diarrhea did not appear to have been mentioned. Journalists are still attempting to determine whether this was coincidental. In addition, Public Safety has been rumored to be teaming up with the Center for Student Mental Health and Well-Being and janitorial staff to start a new initiative titled, “Light up that blunt = light up that ass” in an attempt to encourage students to save their bowels (and their restrooms) by staying away from weed.

To better understand the data and how they came across the results to begin with, lead researcher Dr. Tatiana S. Festicki was invited to share their findings in an exclusive interview. “Given the large sample size, we were able to establish a significant association between the variables using a linear regression model – which basically means we made a scatterplot of the data and stuck a line through it – which ended up making sense for some reason – which we were not really expecting, to be honest...” they trailed off as they received a phone call. They returned a few minutes later – with a question for us this time; “Is there a Taco Bell in Houghton?” they asked, to which we replied affirmatively. “God f*ing damn it we have a confounding variable! Of course there’s a f*ing Taco Bell in Houghton – that explains everything! God damn it!” They yelled as they stormed out of the room. Approximately 260 minutes later, the study and its findings were rescinded, and Dr. Tatiana S. Festicki was no longer available for comment

*Participants who dine at Wadsworth Hall more than three times per week were excluded from the study for undisclosed reasons
