Eternal Worm Destroys Half of Wads

Transient Nicky

Greetings fellow students, this past week has been full of strife. However, a new problem has reared its head. In the early hours of Sunday morning, the Eternal Worm rose up from the ground and destroyed half of Wadsworth hall leaving several dead and many without power nor heat. Shortly after causing the damage, the Eternal Worm burrowed back into the ground where it will come back again to feast one day.

This has understandably angered housing. When asked for their thoughts, the Director of Housing said, "We are very upset about the Eternal Worm catastrophe. This has cost us loads of money and we aren't even sure how we are going to house even more students next year." In order to combat this sudden expenditure, Housing has announced that they are going to charge every student $200,000 and have opted to not fix Wadsworth hall to punish the students for not preventing the Eternal Worm's return.

"We didn't even know the Eternal Worm was going to come back", said Hans Job, a second-year computer science student. "We thought he was a one-and-done deal ya know. You never expect the second worm attack." Hans is one of many students who think it is deeply unfair to not only be charged extra money for the damage dealt by the worm but to also have to live in a half-destroyed Wadsworth. "I'm paying $30,000 to be here and I don't even get heat, water, or a staircase to get to the ground floor. Also, who the hell has an extra $200,000 laying around?" said another student Mike Hawk.

Housing had this to say in response, "While we understand that some people find this to be unfair, we need to make sure that the people who let the Eternal Worm come back know that they are in the wrong and should feel bad". "It hardly seems fair to punish everyone for something the Eternal Worm did," retorted Harry Cox, a forestry student. "Nuh-uh," responded Housing.

While all this is very contentious, it, unfortunately, seems like Housing will not relent in their new plan to punish the students for letting the Eternal Worm come back. When asked about potential ways to prevent additional comings of the Eternal Worm, Housing told us this, "We don't know, do we look like we know the future? Sacrifice some sheep or something for all we care, just don't let the goddamn worm back". Soon after saying this however, the Eternal Worm sprang up from the ground once more and ate this representative of Housing as they did not refer to the Eternal Worm properly as "The Eternal Worm." This is just a minor setback for housing though as they plan to charge for the additional damages incurred from this third coming of the Eternal Worm.

University Pledges to Fix Spring for Good

DJ Benjamin

Every year around March, universities are forced to suspend classes for a week to mend damages and perform maintenance on Spring itself. "Spring Breaks Every year. It's shoddy construction handed down from the last guy," the head of Maintenance at MTU said in an interview while inspecting the extensive list of things that needed fixing. "Leave it to universities to fix things just well enough so that it's next year's problem."

Scientists warn that breaks in the season, if left unattended, can cause severe weather events, flooding, accelerate climate change, printer elf strikes and eternal worm events. And we all know we can't have the elves striking, so universities have prioritized and planned preventative maintenance for Spring breaks as long as they've existed. But now, MTU has decided they have had enough of the yearly drag.

"We are proud to announce our initiative to forever mend breaks in Spring." A university representative said in a public statement. He went on to detail some of the specifics of the initiative, including allocating funding for stronger springs, reinforcements, and research into materials that are less likely to develop gaps and breakages. Independent watchdogs pointed out that the package also includes 50% pay increases for the executive staff of the university, before they went back to play fetch at the dog park and pee on fire hydrants and whatnot and henceforth. The university quickly made comment that the pay increases "were to compensate for the additional responsibility of executive staff to ensure spring remained unbroken, since a majority of the staff in charge of mending it would be cut."

Students protested the move to try to fix Spring forever. "Nothing is forever" 3rd-year basket weaver Ben Dover pointed out, "They'll just make it a problem every 5 or 10 years rather than every year." Other students voiced doubts over the efficacy of the plan. "If they try to make spring less breakable, we'll just try a bit harder-" Before exposing the greatest conspiracy ever to involve college students, the student was whisked away by pep band and never heard from again.
