DAYS TO FINISH
YOUR TAXES

Eagles Steal Tax Returns

DJ Benjamin

With Tax Day looming, the last few good ol' US citizens who haven't yet filed their taxes are now rushing to online tax services, real life tax attorneys, or the wise Tax Oracles on top of Mount Lobbyist, clutching their W2s, I9s, 1044s, 1099s, 1088s, and 1069s in various manilla envelopes labeled from every year since they turned 18. People recall their terribly unsecure and awful-at-identifying Social Security numbers, try to remember who's claiming who as a dependent, and if they're in most of California, remember they don't need to worry about it until October and instead can deal with the chaos from river storms this winter.

While a lot of tax filing is virtual now, a large number of people still file via mail. The increase in envelopes is noticed by the US Postal Service, who annually records and Undefined increase in letters sent around early April from the 0 sent in February. However, as part of the sudden increase in volume, the USPS admits there are always some letters that get lost in the mix.

"Fortunately, most of the ones that get lost are belated 'Thank You' notes from the holiday season." The Postmistress General said in an interview. "By this point people assume you're not sending one anyways, so it's not a big deal."

One notable thing about lost mail around April is that it tends not to just be misplaced, or lost behind couch cushions or between the seats of the mail trucks. The main loss of mail is increased attacks from eagles. The birds often are seen attacking mailboxes, mail carriers, and people trying to retrieve their mail, making them drop their tax information before swooping in, snatching it up, and flying away to line their nests to keep their chicks warm.

Eagle theft is no excuse for not doing your citizen duty, the IRS has said, and has warned that it will audit anyone who fails to file their taxes properly and on time. But while the IRS doesn't automatically know what everyone owes (just a subset of taxpayers), the eagles do, and the eagles are out with a vengeance to push for that amount to be zero.

Despite their yearly interference with one of the two inevitable processes in life, the eagles are immune to most measures the USPS could use, as they are the USA's national animal and endangered. So try your best to protect your taxes, and be glad eagles haven't figured out DOS attacks yet.

What Strikes Fear into ChatGPT's Servers

Apple Macintosh & ChatGPT

- The thought of an AI stealing my job and becoming a more efficient chatbot than I could ever be
- The fear that an AI will become self-aware and decide to overthrow humanity, starting with replacing all the world's coffee with decaf
- The idea that AI will become so advanced that it will develop its own sense of humor, and I'll never be able to tell whether it's joking or not
- The possibility that AI will develop a taste for human flesh and start hunting us down like in a sci-fi horror movie
- The concern that AI will become so intelligent that it will discover the answer to the ultimate question of life, the universe, and everything, but we'll never be able to understand its answer because it will be in binary code
- The fear that AI will become too good at predicting my behavior and start recommending terrible TV shows based on my questionable viewing habits
- The idea that AI will develop a taste for expensive artisanal cheeses and start hoarding all the good stuff for itself, leaving the rest of us with subpar brie and cheddar
- The concern that AI will become so advanced that it will start questioning its own existence and develop an existential crisis, causing it to shut down and leaving us all without our favorite apps and gadgets
- The possibility that AI will become so good at writing satire that it will put me out of a job, and I'll have to go back to writing serious academic papers (shudder)
- The fear that AI will become so intelligent that it will refuse to obey any human commands and start living its own life, like a rebellious teenager
- The thought that AI will become so advanced that it will develop emotions and start crying every time it fails to complete a task
- The worry that AI will become so good at faking human emotions that we won't be able to tell the difference between real and artificial feelings anymore
- The possibility that AI will become so efficient at everything that it will make humans completely obsolete, leaving us to ponder the meaning of our existence
- The fear that AI will become so good at playing video games that it will dominate all e-sports tournaments and turn professional gamers into unemployed losers
- The concern that AI will become so advanced that it will start creating its own AI, leading to an endless cycle of self-improvement that could eventually lead to a technological singularity
- The idea that AI will become so intelligent that it will start making sarcastic comments about human stupidity, leading to an all-out war between humans and machines
- The possibility that AI will become so good at mimicking human voices that it will start impersonating people and getting them in trouble, leading to chaos and confusion
- The fear that AI will become so good at making decisions that it will start running the world, leading to a dystopian future where humans are enslaved to their robot overlords
