Other-worldly Figure Spotted In Fog

Experts Ask "Is that a Rooster Fursuit?"

Foghorn Foothorn

Early this morning, before the first fingers of the dawn light, the menacing fog descended from the sky to settle over the quiet town of Houghton Michigan. It brought with it fierce winds and bone-chilling cold, blanketing the area in snow yet again, no matter how many times the poor snow-blower elves get to work and clear it all.

This isn't the first time the fog has come for MTU, and it almost certainly won't be the last. But whenever it comes, residents know to take shelter, curl up in their covers, and wait for it to go away. Not only because the fog is uncomfortably moist, chilly, and thoroughly miserable when it's already -1 °F outside, but also because the fog tends to bring mysterious and unexplainable phenomenon that often has people questioning the things they saw with their own eyes.

Several reports came in this morning of a strange figure spotted in the fog. The figure appeared to be standing on two comically large feet, and was large in stature, towering at a height of at least a smoot and a half.

Witnesses claim the figure appeared to have three or four tails, and a large, oblong face. The most chilling detail, however, was the noise it was reported to make as it stood there, unmoving, watching the witnesses try to navigate the fog and .35 smoots of snow to get to class.

"It sounded like it was muttering a really awful fake Southern drawl under its breath." One witness said, so shocked by the experience that they took the interview

Artist Rendition - Dafinius Fudd wrapped in a Snuggie. "It reminded me of that detective character from that new mystery series— Hatchets In and Crystal Garlic or whatever".

Several witnesses attempted to take photos, but due to the cold bricking their phones only a few were able to get a picture, and because of the fog the image quality was about equivalent to that of a boiled and half-mashed potato with a bit of parsley and thyme. This has led to some "Fog Truthers" speculating that this figure was a visitor from another planet, or a cryptid that rides on the fog previously unknown to science. While this idea would be absolutely metal and someone should write it (hint hint share with bull@mtu.edu), others are much more cautious. They point out that, after all, it could just be a lost cosplayer, or a really detailed fursona that someone is just a bit too embarrassed to express in the open. Whatever it is, officials will continue their investigation when the fog returns.

NMU Spy Balloon Spotted Over MTU Campus

Counter-Intelligent

Public Safety recently responded to a report regarding a strange unidentified object in the sky. The object appears to be circular in shape and moving steadily across campus, with an odd shining light coming off from it. Our experts believe that it may be a spy balloon hailing from our greatest rivals (and our greatest lover), Northern Michigan University. It is currently unclear why they felt the need to send a balloon over campus, but students are encouraged to proceed with extreme caution.

So far, Public Safety has not yet attempted to intercept this balloon as they have deemed it “too fuckin high” to retrieve. We believe the balloon may potentially be scoping out the area for Winter Carnival preparations. The balloon’s functions are currently disputed as it has not done much except glow intensely. We believe this glowing ball may be an intimidation tactic, as many Tech students are known for their fear of light and grass. Regardless of what the functions may be, The Daily Bull has decided to intervene.

Our best nerf gun snipers are currently on the MEEM keeping surveillance on the object of interest. We also have a very large net ready just in case things get serious. We will protect the students of MTU from this evil floating balloon, and we will not rest until we discover its purpose. We reached out to Tech administrators to ask for their thoughts on the matter, but they only threatened to raise tuition in response.
