Emergency Alert Causes Dining Disarray

By: Catmoder

This past Wednesday students were treated to a national emergency alert test, sent in the form of a notification on most devices capable of showing information on a screen. Despite the loud blaring screams of phones during lectures and exams, this alert had a secret up its sleeve... CONSPIRACY.

You see, I've been surveying certain individuals on the lovely social media app known as Twitter. I'm not calling it the other thing. These individuals in question claimed that this alert would activate the Covid vaccine, thus turning us all into zombies or something. This alert did, in fact, cause an activation. On Wednesday, just after 2:19 EST, all dining hall ovens simultaneously were activated and set to 375 degrees Fahrenheit.

Dining hall workers were reportedly shocked to discover the raw chicken, which they had sat in the oven to "marinate for serving", was being cooked by the activated ovens. The doors had shut themselves and locked from the inside. Despite desperate attempts to save the chicken from being cooked at proper temperatures fit for consumption, workers were unable to retrieve the dishes in time. The chicken reportedly was stuck in the ovens for 15-20 minutes, around 14.6 minutes too long for normal dining hall regulations and guidelines.

"We tried everything but the damage was done," claimed Fartwell representative Paul Tree in an email. "Despite our best efforts the chicken was both sufficiently cooked and seasoned. That blasted Emergency Alert caused a phone to vibrate into the spice rack, dumping Italian spice mixes and pinches of salt onto the chicken before the doors closed by themselves. We know this is unacceptable and we are taking precautions to ensure this never happens again."
