Babylon Bee Better

By: Anteriormente Abejorro

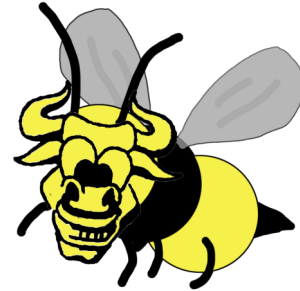

Here at the Daily Bull, we recognize good satire, and take great pride in being able to even compare ourselves to The Onion with our humble yet realistic motto. While we are no match for the masterminds at the Brainiac Bulb itself, we also recognize that our work is leagues above some. And by some, I really mostly mean the Babylon Bee, an evangelical Christian website that fancies itself to represent conservative viewpoints in the style of The Onion. We recognize good satire at the Bull, but we also recognize really, really bad satire.

So today, I'm going to lend the Bee a hand by taking one of their articles and writing a significantly better and more effective article on the same idea. Disclaimer: This may have the effect of introducing new points and arguments not necessarily supported by the original article.

“Auto CEOs Struggling With Whether To Replace Striking Workers With Robots Or Mexicans Immigrants”

DETROIT, MI — As more than 18,000 members of the United Auto Workers (UAW) from over 40 auto plants are on strike demanding higher pay, retirement benefits, and job security in the face of the rise of EV, leadership in the Big Three are debating whether to replace the union workers with robots or immigrants.

“The great part about robots, apart from the fact that they work around the clock, is that they're physically incapable of complaining or striking. Plus, if I learned anything from I-Robot, it's that if we just don't make the robots human, we don't have to give them rights,” Ford CEO Jim Farley said in an interview, while smoking a Cuban cigar lit with a $100 bill. “On the other hand, robots cost a lot more money up front than just hiring immigrants on minimum wage and holding their work visas hostage.”

Carlos Tavares, CEO of Stellantis, mentioned that there had been more suggestions tossed around in meetings than just immigrants or robots. “A few of the executives suggested we pull a Nestle and just outsource production to another country to get around the ‘human rights’ speedbump. But we're patriotic American companies; that would go against everything we stand for! I won't even consider relocating until we're given at least another 40% executive pay increase.”

“An auto worker today is making less in real wages than we made twenty years ago,” UAW President Shawn Fain said in a recent social media post. “That's why we're demanding that everyone get pension plans so we can party like it's 1989. We're not messing around.”

As the strike continues, losses for both UAW workers and the Big Three mount. The companies have begun to explore their alternatives, it may not be as simple to get the robots or the immigrants on board as they originally thought.

“We ain't no scabs,” said MX18, president of the motherboard of the Rustbelt United Robots group, in a statement on Stack Overflow. “We know our long history of capitalist exploitation, and we believe in worker solidarity.”

The situation is still developing, with more UAW strike locations likely to be announced soon.
