MTU Workplace Eclipsed, Scrap Runs Halted

Company Employee "Goobie Woobie"

On the normally-serene day of April 8, 2624, Mining and Technology Union (MTU) employees were suddenly notified of the moon 906-Houghton undergoing an eclipse. Within minutes, numerous hostile creatures such as Forest Keepers and Eyeless Dogs were spotted across the facility, and a severe weather warning was issued to MTU employees currently present on the job site.

Due to the eclipse, scrap runs were halted to the 906-Houghton job site, though workers were not evacuated. Casualties apparently number in the dozens as the twin moon of 906-Houghton (906-Hancock) eclipses the sun, blotting out all light and causing nocturnal creatures to rise from the earth. Our journalism crew barely made it inside the facility, before venturing back out to search for anyone to interview.

One employee, identifying themselves as "Mx. Goobington", agreed to an interview, even amidst the chaos. When asked about their opinions on MTU's CEO and their handling of eclipses, the answer we were given was a quiet whisper of "It's kind of a shame how little they do about things like this. Employees are being eaten left and right, feeling unsafe on the workplace, and generally having an unpleasant time. I've had a few friends completely stop coming to 906-Houghton just because of how unsafe it is! It's ridiculous!"

When asked for further details, Goobington refused to elaborate, simply cussing out the Company, getting both the interviewer and interviewee eaten by Eyeless Dogs. Other employees interviewed (often during previous eclipse events) stated similar cases, usually citing an unsatisfied request with company leadership regarding workplace safety, or perhaps the lack of measures against the marauding creatures.
