Sunshine's Sports Corner

By Jeremy 'Mr. Sunshine' Loucks ~ Daily Bull

It's been awhile since our last installment, eh? Let's talk about some sports!

First off, Tech news. Our hugely successful and popular Women's Basketball coach, John Barnes, has resigned and taken a position with the Wisconsin program. He's a badger now. BADGER BADGER BADGER BADGER MUSHROOM MUSHROOM. That kind of badger.

His former assistant coach, Kim Cameron, has been promoted and has hired former star Sarah Stream as an assistant coach, as well as Rae Drake (that's a sweet sounding name; I bet he's a real firebreather). Understanding the star power of our women's team, the NCAA has decided that from now on our double-header games will be men

Easter Bunny Facing Unemployment

By Liz Fujita ~ Daily Bull

In the wake of the massive egg recall that left Wal-Mart shelves abysmally blank, there have been many repercussions. Breakfast-oriented restaurants have to resort to - gag - egg beaters, bakeries have begun seeking a new adhesive agent to bind recipes, and angry high schoolers have reverted to TP-ing houses instead of eggng cars.

What most Americans do not realize is the heartbreaking impact these salmonella-encrusted eggs have had on a timeless hero: The Easter Bunny.

"People always think Easter only matters in the mid-spring," said one of Mr. Bunny's spokespeople. "But there are months of planning and staging that go into such a holiday as Easter. We start collecting, dying, and stuffing eggs as early as July most years." With most households hiding more than twenty or thirty eggs, it's not hard to see why the preparations must start so soon.

The Easter Rabbit allegedly began laying off egg-coloring workers just after the recall went into effect. However, as the days continued and the staff fell hundreds of thousands of eggs short, he had to take more drastic measures. His factory is beginning to look wretched, with piles of candy needing something to be put in.

Peter Cottontail trying desperately to make more eggs for easter.

Michigan Tech graduate Richard McClaughry explained, "We definitely understand the hardship that Easter Bunny faces. Santa is very concerned that eggnog production will plummet and he won't be able to host his annual Reindeer Rampage Eggnog Kegger." McClaughry took a job with the North Pole as Director of Eggnog Has-ing a Flavor Control.

With no factory worker left, only a few dozen crates of eggs, and low morale, the Easter Bunny finds himself begging for carrots on the streets like a common hare. What few chickens he did have

A Brief History of The Daily Bull

By Liz Fujita ~ Current Dictator

Long ago, when poverty problems were solved by the plague, and employment was based on your ability to forge, fashion, and create items out of scraps, the Daily Bull was born. It had poor parents, and as a result spent the first years of its life wallowing around in the gutter like an ecstatic warthog.

A stroke of luck befell the young Bull, and it was pulled into the care of a kinder home. There they spoiled it rotten, feeding it roasted chickens, desserts of all kinds, and hash browns. "BRRRRRRPPPPP," belched The Bull. Its family, growing angry at its steady weight gain, decided to kick it out so it would have a life of its own. "Be a productive

Mastering Demons Back at Tech

By Jon 'Big-O' Mahan ~ Daily Bull

As yet another school year approaches, scientists and health experts are warning about the dangers of 'Mastering Physics.' As with every year, the amount of demon related deaths and injuries have skyrocketed as the time draws near for students to embark on a perilous journey down that road. Ever since the 'key' to the program was unlocked, any soul unlucky enough to be stuck with the program automatically has become possessed.

When questioned about their continued use of the program, Michigan Tech had little to say, other than "I reject your reality and instead, substitute my own!" It has been advised that following these omens and this response from MTU that any persons stuck with the program should seek help from outside of campus sources, though opinion on this matter differs.

Oddly enough, the threat of demons has lured some people to the program. Most people when they think of demons envision terrible, horrible monstrosities. These few unlucky souls have since decided to envision something that most, if not all Tech students are familiar with. Succubi.

Unfortunately, many of us know what a succubus is like. They hold many different forms, and can't be masters of trickery. From your sister's best friend, to your roommate's girlfriend's mom, these succubi are dangerous creatures. Though it should be noted, that as of yet, all Succubi coming out of the port- ahem 'Mastering Physics' have looked like Betty White. It's uncertain as to why.

So with that warning and omen, I bid you all farewell, ye damned souls! ☹ member of society!" they cried.

"Your mom," said the Bull.

Out in the real world, our beloved Daily Bull spent a great deal of time experimenting with drugs like LSD-123-ABC-cocaine and marijuana bisulfate-ase. It enjoyed the company of many hookers and blow. It neglected its homework. It fought the law, and the law won. The Daily Bull spent several years in jail, where it became everyone's bitch and had only a few friends.

But hark! A kind soul or two at a small school in rural Michigan decided to give the Daily Bull one saving grace. They invited it to spend a year on campus to see what life in the functional first, women second (in the primetime games).

The Tech Hockey team, disappointing on the ice (but taking #1 in the WCHA Beer Pong tournament), started some preseason stuff with 5 games in Europe. Final record, 2-3, but I bet they picked up some smoking hot babes in Austria and Germany. The trip was merely a ruse however, as the German and Austrian teams really wanted to learn how to drink beer from our accomplished team (they have Oktoberfest, but we have Winter Carnival).

Tech now has Women's Soccer. WOODOOOOOO! Also, a very fun Rugby squad that could use some fans. Get out and support our teams, yo!

In pro sports, the Lions look to not suck this year. Their first-string offense and defense looks good, but since all those players will be injured by week 3, expect another disappointing season. The Vikings get Favre back, and this time it wasn't as much of a media circus. If you're a Bears fan, shoot yourself. And if you are one of the myriad Packer fans that goes to Tech, Aaron Rodgers can choke on a goat. That is all.

In baseball, Team Rocket spokesman Roger Clemens

Talk about getting Shit-Faced. Ugh!

Miami (although Sacramento is filing an infringement lawsuit). Stoudamire to NY, and Tracy McGrady is a Piston. And a couple of players are getting their jollies by representing their countries in a really big tournament somewhere. Yep. Getting their jollies.

Finally, we come to the wonderful world of the NHL. Chicago, after winning the Cup last year, basically tossed ¾ of its players on the streets. Gary ButtBettman, unhappy with the way teams were cheating around his blessed salary cap, is now making long contracts void if they play for someone other than Phoenix or Pittsburgh. And the Red Wings continue to laugh as they draw talent for low prices (Mike Modano bitches!).

And that's sports. How about that weather around here? ☹ to produce eggs have all sold themselves on the black market to crooked cake artisans.

Mr. Bunny's spokespeople reported that even with eggs beginning to line the shelves again, it will be a rough production season. They and their tight budget will likely hire only a few workers back, or replace them with immigrants to save on expenses. Children will have fewer eggs to hunt for – that will lead to a decline in candy consumption, plus crashes in business for dentists.

"Bunny is very unfamiliar with the idea of poverty," Tweeted a representative. We can simply hope that the egg industry recovers quickly, or we may be left hiding rabbit turds stuffed with Tootsie Rolls – and then there will be worse health problems than salmonella facing our children. ☹
