2nd Annual Raffle Winners Deemed Cooler Than Average Tech Student

By Liz Fujita ~ Daily Bull

Hear ye, hear ye! The results for this year's K-Day raffle/contest are in! This year, we spent approximately $50.00 on candy – good candy at that. We asked those of you stopping by our booth to take a guess as to how much all that tooth-rotting, sugar-high-inducing goodness weighed. More specifically, because we are evil, we wanted your guess to be in grams. Take that, American units!

The closest four guesses were as follows:

James Juip, with 6,210
Joe Nicholson and Ashok Goel, both with 6,000
James Robinson, with 5,682

The correct answer was – drumroll! – 5,971.1 grams, just a hair over 13 pounds. Our winners, Joe and Ashok, were off by only 28.9 grams.

New, Controversial "Love-Powered Laser" Testing Continues

By Bryne Judy ~ Daily Bull

Heated debate across the country over the morality of developing this new super weapon continues today, with both sides strongly upholding their beliefs. Despite world-wide ardent protests, marches, and even the occasional riot breaking out, testing continues on grounds that this device will usher in a new era.

The device in question, dubbed "Revenge, Bitches" by its creator Professor Grudge, has been heralded by many as the successor to the nuclear bomb. A beautiful, nearly half-mile wide beam of multicolored death, it can exhibit incredible levels of power dependent on the area it is fired in. While firing it in deserted areas nets enough energy to reduce two to three tranquil meadows to ash and dust, and firing it over the average city produces a beam capable of coring out four mountains before running out of power, (a blast notably stronger than most nuclear bombs) the device shows the potential for much greater levels of destruction. The little known, controversial "Woodstock Disaster" refers to testing of the weapon during the event bearing the same name which is estimated to have quadrupled the output of the Tsar Bomb (the largest, most powerful nuclear bomb ever created, tested during the cold war, which is thought to have produced 1.4% the output of the sun for ~39 nanoseconds). The resulting beam arc-

To put that 5,971.1 into perspective, it's equal to about 16.5 beers, 0.000017 of a Boeing 747, or about 398 small chocolate chip cookies. Imagine if we had given away one of those things! Need to bribe your whole PH 2100 class? Have some cookies! Problem solved. Granted, I'm not sure how to give away 0.000017 of a jumbo jet... maybe you would have received all the "emergency info" brochures or the left leg of one stewardess.

Credit should also be given to those guessers with the creative juices to make our lives more interesting. One entrant suggested 42424242 (which destroyed the average faster than U Chem destroys your grades). Nice try. Another guess was pi*571.15859, which was both far too low and made me want to whip out the red grader pen to write "PLEASE SIMPLIFY" everywhere.

Liz Fujita went so far as to assume the Daily Bull can afford eleventy-billion grams of candy. If we're assuming eleventy to be 110 (as per Bilbo's 111th, eleventy-first, birthday), then Wolfram Alpha tells me that eleventy-billion grams is approximately equal to 1/3 the Empire State Building, and close to 3/4 the total gold ever mined. GOOD LORD, THAT IS A LOT OF CANDY!

On the other end of the spectrum, we had quite a few entries in the 100-200's range. Really? I recommend you cease and desist trying to do science and leave that to physics majors.

Good news amid all the mocking, though – the average guess was right around 5,400. That means people on the whole have fairly good judge of weight, or eat so much candy that they are naturally calibrated to figure out how much they could be eating at this moment.

The four winners will be receiving their prizes: king sized candy, another king sized candy, a large roll of bubble wrap, and "Galaxy Quest" are up for grabs. Tune in next time for yet another ridiculous Daily Bull contest. Until then, happy candy eating!

ing off into space. Needless to say, military officials are eager to put the prototype into mass-production for "self defense purposes" after testing concludes. Professor Grudge had the following to say about the making of the weapon.

"They laughed at me, yes they did. They laughed. Told me I'd be alone forever. Told me no person, no woman could ever love me. Well, let them laugh now. Let them laugh now. My precious device shall strike at the very root of my suffering, shall scour the ever-present rot which fills our society from the face of our world. I shall turn in, particularly the hordes of hippies from Woodstock, have literally begun foaming at the mouth at the thought of this device. Max Becklin, who witnessed the testing, had this to say:

"It has stolen everything from me. I have nothing left to live for but to see it ruined. That unholy thing must be destroyed. Most of us feel this way. I hope to god nobody else will ever have to, and will fight to achieve that."

The man had a chilling emptiness in his eyes rarely seen these days outside crack addicts and accountants. While the majority of the protesters seem to have dedicated their lives to preventing use of it, the U.S. military has dispatched a number of troops in conjunction with the police force to prevent them from accomplishing their goals. We will report further findings as they come.

In other news, divorce rates have skyrocketed recently. The cause remains unknown.
