Bull v. Bull – A Second Smelter Conspiracy

By Benjamin Loucks
~ Daily Bull ~

As many have already been made aware, last Saturday, a building which was part of an abandoned smelter in Hancock went up in flames. At 11 PM firefighters were called to the scene and had quite a fun time spraying the bejeebus out of the burning building for hours on end. Though the Fire Marshall is still trying to determine the exact cause of the rather crowd-gathering blaze, a confidential informant to the Daily Bull known only as "BLU Spy" has informed us that cause was indeed arson, and it was perpetuated by a company called Reliable Excavation Demolition.

Reliable Excavation Demolition (Or RED for short), for those not in the know, is a myriad of sub-fronts who secretly control half of the world's governments. Their

Internet Superheroes

By Matt "Undercover Minority" Villa ~ Daily Bull

A crazy happenstance has occurred here at Michigan Tech. The crazy rain-storm last week, coupled with negative energy from the Sun, sent a strange power surge through the network, randomly affecting many residents using Tech's ResNet. Working with ResNet, we managed to find a few cases of the affected, some with good outcomes, and others bad.

This is what you get for trash-talking my momma.
On the INTERNETS (a series of tubes)

We came upon a young man named Jayko Livens, who had reportedly been playing Modern Warfare 2 that night. "It was weird, my computer started freaking out, then I was back to playing the game. After I was getting tired of this smack-talking 13-year old, I suddenly found myself able to see him, as if I was right behind him. I took the opportunity and smacked him upside the head, that's when I discovered that I could actually smack dumb people over the internet," explained Jayko. Jayko's power was not the only good occurrence.

Another student, this time a young Liv Hoppenpoplous, sought us out and gave us her story. "I was just doing some research on Google for a paper I was writing, and suddenly the screen went super bright. Right after that, I suddenly felt that I knew whatever I was looking at, and when people would ask me to look up something, I could tell them whatever they needed to know without looking it up. It's like I AM Google, go ahead, ask me anything, I'm feelin' lucky."

All changes are not good however, as

... Fortress 2 Team from front rivals, the Builders League United (BLU for short) own the other half. Within various two-forts, gravel pits, and the like, the two companies often hire heavy-duty mercenary teams to burn, explode, shoot and otherwise maim each other in spectacular fashion for control over individual hotly-contested sites. Soldiers, scouts, black Scottish Demomen, Heavy Weapons Guys, Snipers and others are usually part of the roster, fighting with fierce tenacity and plenty of taunt kills.

Occasionally, one of their battle-grounds can suffer some pretty crazy damage, and the poor, poor smelter in Hancock was no exception to this rule. A late-night Capture the Intelligence battle ended up in a stalemate when a RED pyro, known for his (or is it her?) extreme love of fire and inability to speak, lit up the carpenter's building which was being used as a sort of 'spawn point' for the BLU team. This was, apparently, against the rules of the engagement and much complaining about spawn-camping was made. Though the the fire should only have burned the building for about 10 seconds, which is the

GENTLEMEN.

The RED pyro was obviously overjoyed according to our informant, raising their flamethrower into the air in triumph and yelling something unintelligible, possibly in a Star Wars reference.

However, the two teams took too long in finishing their appointed job - the result of overturling Engineers - and the smelter building had pretty much gone up in a blaze of glory. With fire sirens on the approach, both teams scattered like spycrabs, and the battle ended up in stalemate. When questioned about this turn of events, the Houghton police chief commented, "Stalemate, huh? Well, I guess that means they're all losers. Buncha maggots! I'm going Soldier next time anywa... err, thanks for the info."

On a side note, the owners of the smelter buildings have allegedly sued Mann Co., creator of the flamethrower used to torch the building, for approximately $12.7 million dollars. CEO of Mann Co., Saxton Hale, has commented that he intends to settle out of court... WITH HIS BARE FISTS. ☹

Peartridge

In a bizarre case of convergent evolution, partridges have spent millions of years developing bodies that are perfectly adapted to mimic the shape of pears. Sadly, this attempt to ward off predators proves fruitless, as partridges are brown and pears are generally greenish-yellow. -John Earnest, Daily Bull zombie back from the grave in the case of Liv's class mate Ann Abelle. "I was doing some research on Wikipedia for the paper in class, when my screen got really bright, then boom, I suddenly knew everything. And not just about the topic, but about everything and anyone. Problem is, sometimes the information is wrong, or I'll suddenly think a celebrity is dead when they aren't, like poor ol' Justin Bieber. Why did he have to die being attacked by a pack of transvestites, WHY? Good Night, Sweet Prince."

In yet another case of powers gone wrong, we take a look at Kyle Omaigad, who happened to be looking at the popular site 4Chan during the storm. Because of Kyle's state, his roommate gave an explanation of what happened. "It was weird, he was spoutin' off memes and shit, then suddenly I saw a flash from behind me and BOOM, there he is on the floor, gurgling. I picked him up and put him on the futon, trying to get him to come to, but all he could say was "Newfag" and "Desu". It was seriously weird man, I feel bad for the guy." Kyle is currently residing in the Hancock Mental Health Facility.

One of the most bizarre cases was the disappearance of Steve Jones, who was playing World of Warcraft at the time of the surge. His roommate explains, "He was raiding one minute, then he was gone the next. I have no idea where he went, I looked behind me, and his chair was empty, even the Cheetos were gone!" A missing persons report is still out for Steve; however any clues to his whereabouts have yet to be found. Contacting Blizzard Entertainment, we asked about his character to see if he had said anything about where he may have gone. Blizzard looked up his record and told us that his character hasn't logged off since the accident, and is currently raiding ICC 10.

More on these changes when they develop. ☹
