A Sorta-Kinda-Not-Really Thorough List of Hilarious BBC Headlines

By Cameron Long ~ Daily Bull

"Girl's horror as 21,000 RSVP Facebook party invite." This was a headline last week on the BBC website. Apparently, a 14-year-old girl wanted to invite 15 people to her 15th birthday party. According to the article, she was "alarmed" when 1400x that number said they were coming. However, the Hertfordshire Police has assured the family that the event is no longer taking place. The local grocer is reportedly very relieved, as he had failed to stock 1,000-odd boxes of cupcake mix.

This delightful fiasco has come in the wake of "concerns being raised that Facebook's privacy settings are too complicated." Yeah, for everyone who can't understand "friends only" and how to work a mouse. In Recently, a group of Wadsworth Hall students found themselves with that exact dilemma. As a flaming microwave was reported to have exploded out of a second floor window last Sunday, it posed a new threat to the students of MTU and a possible concern for how life is to be lived in the dorms.

The loud explosion and falling glass created much fear among the Wadsworth residents. "I did not hear any explosion, and no one told me anything about this until now," Second Year Bryce Anderson elaborated as he told us his gripping experience with the flaming microwave, "but I guess it might be a problem, not that falling from two stories would be that dangerous. I doubt anyone would be directly bellow that." Bryce was not the only student shaken by the disastrous event. Christina Sleeth saw the flaming microwave as she was walking from DHH, "I think I saw something, when did this happen again? Oh, well last Sunday I did see a broken microwave on the ground, but I thought it was just trash." Christina also told us that the burning light from the microwave's billowing fire had almost blinded her. "Well I am a little blind in my left eye, but I was born with it."

Due to the seriousness of this tragedy a school-wide meeting was held the next day in Fisher 135. The entire lecture hall was packed with concerned students and staff. "We actually did not meeting in 135. There was an Engineering Exam going on at that time," Dan Bennett, head of public safety, reported how the high stress levels in the room had caused it to be a tense and fear driven gathering, "From what I have been told, there were only a few witnesses to the accident, it was really just a misunderstanding." The flaming microwave had even raced fear up the ranks of public safety.

Anthony Lavingne, the student who had experienced the horrific horrors of the flaming microwave first hand, got a few words in as he was rushed off campus for burn treatments, "It really was a stupid thing for me to do. I was a little drunk, and my burnt popcorn scared me a little, so I chucked the microwave out of the window."

Microwave super-critical. Exploding in 3... 2... 1...

Anthony's burns from the flaming microwave made him cringe at every word. "Now I have been suspended for defacing school property." The hospital reports state that Anthony will not return from critical care for full year.

Now that the growing fear of the flaming microwave has reached every student on campus, many are concerned that this may be a large threat in the future. "Bug off, I don't want to be in your stupid newspaper," Charles Rose explained his paranoia of possible flaming microwave incidents in the future.

He told us how he thought the school should begin teaching students how to survive events of flaming microwaves,

"Now get the hell out of my room." Our only hope for surviving in a world of flaming microwaves is to remember Anthony Lavingne's first rule for survival: Cardio. Stay fit and exercise daily, and you might have a chance of getting the fire as far away from yourself as possible. Otherwise you might have to put yourself out.

The Infected Campus

By Samantha Schall ~ Daily Bull

Once upon a time, there was a quite peaceful campus. Student learning their materials for classes, professors teaching the classes and conducting research, TA's grading way too many papers to deem sane. And look, there's a pretty little birdie and some cute squirrels. What's that there? A... horde of people?

Yes, it's a horde of people running around, one group chasing another. The chased with armbands are throwing around socks while the other head-banded people just dodge and continue the chase. For those who don't know, this is Humans vs. Zombies. It is your favorite childhood dream; a giant, campus wide, multi-day game of tag. The Human are trying to stay alive while the Zombies are trying to infect them. Zombies win if everyone playing is a Zombie; Any living humans at the end of the game win.

Though beware, everywhere outdoor (aside from roads, parking lots and athletic fields) is open game to be tagged. Staying alive is the name of the game, and a lot of people are working against you.

Interested in joining? Talk to Fletcher Swanson in 235 DHH. He'll give you the rules and anything else needed. So, my fellow Humans, I may be a Zombie by the time you read this, so, enjoy and stay alive!

Warning- Nerf-guns not yet allowed. YET!!!
