"Beam Me Up, Carl"

By Bill Melcher ~ Daily Bull

Some of you may have noticed the chair in the entryway of the MUB. It's just sitting there for seemingly no reason with a sign above it saying "DO NOT MOVE THIS CHAIR". I've begun to wonder, why exactly is it there? Here are a few possible reasons.

Scenario 1: "Hidden Camera TV Show." If you try to move the chair, chimpanzees will descend on you from everywhere at once. The surprised and terrified Tech student should of course scream and run, but BAM! The doors are locked. The chimps block the hallway - the only choice is to run in the basement, but there's Crisco all over the steps. You fall and hit your head, coming to hours later strapped to a chair in the bowling alley. The doors are blocked off, the lights are dimmed, and Carl Blair is calmly knitting a sweater-vest. "Good, you're awake! Let's get started." He walks over to what looks like

F@#%ing Awesome

By Jodhbir Singh ~ Guest Writer

There were only 3 hours left for my first ever flight to the US. I was going through my checklist to make sure I had packed everything that I needed to start my new life at Tech. At last minute I found that I had forgotten my dictionary. I took my cousin and bought a CD of Oxford's advanced learner's dictionary just before my flight. In the US, unfortunately, I haven't found much use of it. Here, the English language is very simple and easy.

In the last two years, the most commonly used word I have heard, other than 'Thank you,' is 'F@#% You.' Especially the four letter 'F' word which has got great recognition, in the US, beyond its literal meaning. Let me break it down for you to understand it. As an adjective, you could say, I am f@#%ing happy today, which probably could mean you are getting laid tonight. However, it can also be used for sad situation. For example, I am fucking low today, which could mean that someone has dumped you.

Well, I'm pretty sure this would be a good time to use one of the many applications of the F-word.

As a verb I found it to be limited to very narrow circumstances. If you say-I am f@#%ed man! It may imply that you are in a deep s h e e t (apologies for my Indian accent). Another use of it as a verb has been very dangerous experience for me.

So, I was with some white friends of mine including her. In the middle of our talk, she uttered some strange words

-f@#% me. Though, it was a strange use of it as a verb, I couldn't decide if I should take it in literal sense or there was some other meaning attached to it. The expressions on her face realized me that I should have put an exclamation sign after what she said. I waited for others to respond to what she just said. Surprisingly, I found that she had forgotten that she had an assignment due the same day. I felt little embarrassed inside. So, please don't tell anyone, especially her about this incident.

This embarrassing incident made me to do some research on the f@#%ing f@#% word. I opened my Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary and found it to be a multipurpose word which can also be used as a noun, other than an adjective and a verb. Add some postfix or use it with some other word, and you can make a new one. Isn't it fucking awesome? 🍌

- wait ... it's a tall-shaft iron furnace! (they're much more efficient than mid-shaft furnaces). Will Professor Blair successfully smelt our minds into blubbering goo? Will the victim pick up a spare and get out alive (awake)? Tune in next week.

Scenario 2: "Transformers." If you so much as THINK about moving the chair, the entire MUB will transform into a Black and Yellow Camaro SS. It'll come to life, Rickroll everyone within earshot, and then lose a figure-8 race to the 2011 Mustang GT due to Ford's inherent supremacy. The MUB will re-form with an even worse floor-plan and the chair will be just a little bit smaller indicating defeat. It's rumored that if the MUB ever wins a track race against a Mustang (lol), the chair will morph into the Captain's throne from Star Trek, complete with present-day William Shatner to assist Professor Blair in "recruitment" (You! Come on. Touch the chair. You know . You. Want to.)

Scenario 3: "Any fool can make a rule, and any fool will mind it." Some jokester put the chair there years ago, and it has never moved because we've all assumed that there's a reason someone else wants it there. Perhaps they will come back to campus long enough to see their chair before slipping into a laughter-induced coma.

Scenario 4: "What Chair?" As soon as the article is printed, the chair that's been there for over a year will be snatched away. 🍌
