The Facebook Feed Plague

Nathan "Invincible" Miller

As we're all well aware, Facebook has a mini-feed on your news feed. Xzibit jokes aside, I actually find it somewhat interesting because it shows everything your friends do, while the normal feed only shows "important" updates. It also moves and updates instantly so it's really great for distracting me from homework.

Because it displays nearly everything your friends do, every post they like or comment on also gets placed into the mini-feed. That means I get to see the posts of people I don't know. Talk about creepy. I also get to see interactions between friends that may not have gone on my regular feed. Best of all, it also brings up posts from the past that people may have forgotten about.

Over the summer I went to a music festival and made some funny faces at cameramen while I was on the front rail. I found one of those pictures and put it on my Facebook, and a bunch of my friends liked it and commented on how ridiculous it was. I didn't keep it on my profile so it disappeared into the pile of 600 other pictures I'm tagged in, possibly never to be seen again. Or not.

Months later, somebody was going through my tagged pictures and liked that goofy one. This like was then broadcasted to all of their friends via the mini-feed. Despite being dead and buried for months, the picture was now fresh and given a new lease on life. Many more likes and com-

by Alex Dinsmoor ~ Daily Bull

Earlier this week, the International Union of Pure and Applied Physics (IUPAP) instituted three new elements, Darmstadtium (Ds), Roentgenium (Rg) and Copernicium (Cn), into the periodic table we all know and love. These three elements, numbered 110, 111, and 112 respectively are the newest additions to the table. Although they were approved by the International Union of Pure and Applied Chemistry long before, it is not until the IUPAP approves the element that it becomes "official." Although so many groups "approve" the elements, they always fail to ask an important third party: the element Hydrogen.

Ever since the first periodic table of elements was created, Hydrogen has always gotten the short end of the stick. Not only is it the smallest element, but it has forever been isolated from the other elements of the table. The centuries of isolation has lead Hydrogen to become an extremely lonely element, with none of his friends to talk with, since all of the alkali metals are profound "jerks" and are always "ready to over-react to the situation."

When we talked with Hydrogen about the situation, it seemed much

News in Briefs: Man Dies After Ordering Burger

Jon 'Big-O' Mahan ~ Daily Bull

HOUGHTON, MI- A Houghton man and native California resident, died recently after eating a burger he bought online.

The man, an MTU student, was a native of the state of California who, upon hearing the news that a website online was offering to sell him 2 double-double burgers, could not resist the offer. Despite the $56 cost, and the night's wait, the man received his glorious burger yesterday at 5pm.

It was recorded that the man entered Hancock Hospital, and eventually Marquette general, with a case of 'HOLY SHIT I ATE INTERNET FOOD, OH GOD MY BOWELS.'

The man left a terrible mess everywhere before dying. Autopsy, however, has ruled out the company at fault. "Clearly, this man was an idiot, and it was not the company's fault he died. Although he should have cooked the burger, and microwaved the rest of it to be safe, I don't think he could wait another second for his meal." In'n'Out has denied responsibility, and has retained it's cult following despite this incident. 🙄 too excited that someone finally was talking to it. It said "No one ever likes to hang out with the smallest element. They always make fun of me and have even forced me to be all along in the corner of the table. I wish someone would just notice me..."

With new elements populating the table, one can only wish that at least one of those elements will look back to their roots and hang out with the original element. Though, looking at the upcoming elements, they appear to be jerks like the rest. 🙄 ments on the image ensued, some even by people who thought it was great the first time around.

The more people who interacted with my image, the more posts about it showed up in people's mini-feeds. This plague has shown no signs of abating even after multiple days and many new hosts. Inevitably some people's mini-feeds are sparser than others (fewer friends = fewer posts), meaning the image may stay "active" for longer.

Realizing that folks will click on just about anything that pops up in their mini-feed, I have begun liking or commenting on my own images and posts from years ago to make them active again. This has worked surprisingly well, as many of my outdated photo albums have gone through another cycle of views years later.

Going along with this idea, I may also start liking other people's old posts and images to make them active. Naturally, I would choose the most hilarious and embarrassing ones to dredge back up. With luck new plagues will start and be nearly impossible to eliminate short of deleting the original post altogether. Think of it like facebook memories, except selectively evil. 🙄
