Spinny Hurricanes Made the Sun Puke

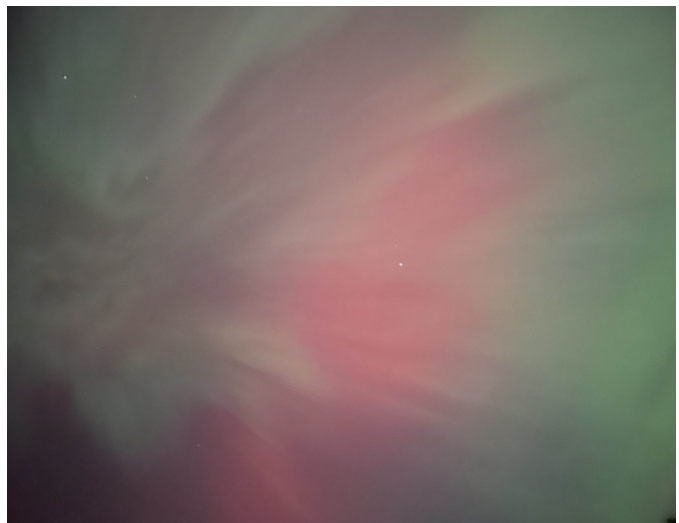

Semi-Casual Lights Enjoyer

Many sources say that over the past few weeks, hurricanes on Earth had been not only adversely affecting us Earthlings, but also causing distress for our sun — with some experts reporting the sun showing signs of a tummy ache as early as last week. The currently widely-accepted reason for this unfortunate phenomenon is the spinny nature of the hurricanes making our poor star dizzy. However, some claim that the natural disasters' impact on Earth is what really made the sun sick to its stomach. Regardless of the cause, it all came to a head yesterday. The sun couldn't handle it any more and frew up all over the sky, covering it with a mess of green, violet, and red from the last metric shit-ton of hydrogen it ate. Investigation on the exactly why this event occurred continues, but experts currently have bigger fish to fry — as sure as the sun rises, less-accepted theories for last night's event are swarming the masses.

Numerous online claims insist that those responsible for the hurricanes did it for the sole purpose of making the sun sick and forcing colors upon the sky — numerous casualties and pain inflicted upon our own star just to make the night sky align with their agenda. Others claim that the kP was simply rigged. According to them, it was artificially inflated in the colors' favor, and this never would've occurred had it been measured by honest methods. Many have taken back and/or deleted their comments, though, particularly after one user, on the condition of remaining anonymous, mentioned, "I have no idea who did this or why, but if they've got control over the hurricanes and can make the sun puke, I sure as hell ain't gonna argue with them..."

As it remains uncharacteristically warm and heckin windy in Houghton, residents have been asked to not question the situation regarding the sun in an effort to prevent further unusual weather in the area. This advisory will remain in effect at least until election season has ended, by which point our snow allocation for the year should be decided. It is recommended that those who notice themselves becoming too curious go out, enjoy the fall colors, and ask themselves whether it's really worth the consequences to ponder the subject. If so, they're encouraged to take lots of pictures, as it may be their last chance. May the forces be in your favor.
