Student Tears are the Only Consistent Beverage Left

Benedrine Peters

It's been a hot start to the year here on campus, which made it all the more crushing when students discovered that a drought seems to have hit the MTU dining halls this week. Thirsty students have been repeatedly met with "Oopsies, Be Back Soon!" and "Thanks For Loving!!!"-type nonsense instead of their favorite flavors. The lesser flavors such as Cherry Pepsi and Gatorade were the first to go, later followed by Diet Pepsi, which raised a few eyebrows and aggravated the eight people who actually like it. The real problems started when the lemonade turned into water as if touched by some asshole reverse Jesus working in the back, and when the Sierra Mist (fine, Starry) lost all its redeeming qualities (sugar) by serving sparkling water instead, which tastes like TV static. Reports have even come in of the fuel and lifeblood itself of MTU, Pepsi and Mountain Dew, being allegedly closed for business. The message is clear: no drink is safe from the apathy of dining employees.

The pressures of the dire drink demand impact everybody as Husky Eats feels the heat. So many machines are breaking that the dining staff seem to be running out of socially acceptable "out of order"-type signs and are instead forced to resort to cutesy little attempts at pathos that say things like "Sowwy, no more dwink OwO", "This john straight up empty, fam", and "You loved our liquids too much!" The staff aren't the only ones breaking under the pressure, though. This reporter was present when one of the machines in Wadsworth Hall decided that it couldn't take the demands of unquenched students anymore and burst into tears through its water spigot, forcing a flustered-looking professional to close the whole machine down indefinitely.

Additionally, an "unrelated and definitely not intentional" lack of functional ice makers has led to a new, underground currency trading hands among the most temperature-desperate beverage enthusiasts. Liquid water is commonplace, as every spout seems to exclusively yield the stuff, but frozen water... Well, that's one cold hot commodity. Dorm room freezers become closely-guarded gold mines as thousands clamor for just a taste of tepid temperatures. Students have been reported to pay hundreds of dining dollars for just a single cube in their drinks. The mafia bosses of this new ice trade call the situation "icy." I see why.

The cries of unsatiated students fall on deaf ears, though, as the dining chain of command seems content to let the wells run dry and gaze happily upon tables full of lukewarm water in hundreds of disposable cups. Without flavor or temperature in our lives, what's left of the dining experience? What is there to sustain me through the slightly spicy bites of the jambalaya? Perhaps one day the proletariat will seize the means of quenichification, and our greatest mechanical engineering majors can fix the damn machines for us. Until then, all we can do is drink what is probably reused shower water and pray for Husky Eats to get their shit together.
