Tenacity, for Beginners

Overly Tenacious

As a whole class of new students here at Michigan Tech have just arrived, many have almost certainly seen the word “tenacity” plastered all over campus and wondered what exactly that’s supposed to mean. It’s a core value here at Michigan Tech, so I find it to be of utmost importance that everyone has a basic idea of what that means around here.

Tenacity can mean a lot of things in a lot of different contexts. In short, it means we’ll put up with a lot of shit, largely because we don’t really have the time and/or balls to do much else about it. Here are some common examples of tenacity that you may encounter in your first few years at Michigan Tech:

- Surviving off of Chartwells’ “food”
- Dealing with the parking situation
- Dealing with the housing situation(s)
- Working nicely with someone you hate for something you love more than you hate them, but fuck are they pushing it.
- Ignoring your basic human needs for the sake of your GPA
- Committing to way too much and showing up to all of it anyways because you technically signed up for it

Whenever the above examples of tenacity (among others) are referenced in conversation on campus, it is customary to provide one or more relevant examples of your own tenacity so that we may all suffer together. However, these examples may not be worse than that of the previous person to share; otherwise, you will enter a competition of tenacity in which whoever’s losing the most in life wins.

It may also be appropriate for all parties to share their concern for their similarly tenacious peers, regardless of whether you have any right whatsoever to talk. Solutions to the problems that caused the need for tenacity to begin with might also be appropriate to be discussed at times, but they are highly unlikely to ever be implemented.

It’d be a little tenacious to finish an article despite having nothing more to write, in the name of never (making it apparent that you’re) giving up, but I’m kinda done with this shit.
