A Pre-Chartwells Retrospective: Dishwasher Salmon

Big Soupiroth

It feels not as if it were long ago that the dining halls were run by Michigan Technological University itself rather than popular food service program Chartwells - yet 2025 marks the 37th year since the change. It's hard to imagine life without the corporate, overproduced ads and "live, laugh, love" type decor brought upon by Chartwells, but yes, there was once a time before. A time when Wadsworth dining hall was violently yellow, the Cafe served more than 5 cheese curds per order, and the ceiling of McNair dripped into a large metal bowl from which I drank out of once and contracted Legionnaires disease. To quote Charles Darwin: "It was the best of times, it was the horse of times"

Perhaps the meal most missed by the ancient souls who remember the old dining halls is Wadsworth Hall's famous "dishwasher salmon". Yes, it's exactly what it sounds like: the fish, caught fresh out of the Portage daily, would be wrapped in Michigan Tech's finest tin foil and left in the dishwasher for approximately 2 hours or until staff felt like taking it out. Some may say that the fish having an aftertaste of soap and dirty dishes is "disgusting" and "a genuine health hazard", but it's evident that we were too harsh on these more unique tastes that made it a tech staple. Perhaps our palettes not yet fully matured, unable to pick up on the flavor notes of the other food remnants that were in the dishwasher along with the salmon. The particular method of preparation made this delicacy like no other.

The other main component that made the dishwasher salmon a cultural set-piece in the once known "little Houghton" was to consume the dishwasher salmon completely unseasoned, and with a fork smashed into a wads table until perfectly flat to enhance the mouthfeel. The ritual, which some may know as a predecessor or originator for the term "tenacity," found controversy as students begun smashing the non-salmon forks. Truly, a signal of the dish's popularity: the demand exceeded the supply. But perhaps this was also its downfall. Found no longer sustainable, the delicacy was phased out with the Chartwells aquasition. Perchance.
